But the chief charm of the Bible class is the question box. Questions are taken up with the collection, and these are submitted to the leader to the number of twenty-five or thirty at every session. Though he has no idea what these questions will be, he is expected to answer them offhand, the only stipulation being that they shall be confined to the lesson as far as possible, and to Biblical matters, textual and otherwise. Latitude is sometimes allowed, so that it is not an unusual thing for matters of popular interest to be discussed. The first question asked Dr. Munhall when the class opened this year in June, was: "What is the teaching of Noah and the flood?" His ready answer: "Get in before it rains," found immediate favor with his class.

I quote a few of the questions together with Dr. Munhall's answers, at the session of the class I attended, several weeks ago:

> Q. Is not the new theology better than the old? A. There is no new theology (vehemently); might as well talk of a new God.
> Q. Is it right or Scriptural to pray for the conversion of a sinner? A. Yes, if you are doing all you can to point him to the way of life. I would rather pray first for his conviction of sin, and then when he was under conviction I would pray for his conversion.
> Q. Do you think a Christian should ride on the street cars on Sunday? Some say it is right if they are going to church or to lead a meeting. A. No; it is never right to do wrong. Four-fifths of the people who ride on the cars to attend worship go past the little church near their homes to go to some big church further up town.
> Q. What do you think of taking a Sunday School excursion to Coney Island? A. I haven't been to Coney Island for twenty years but if it is now anything like it was then, I don't see how you are going to get your Sunday School to heaven by way of Coney Island.

DR. L. W. MUNHALL

In the class everybody is entitled to express his own opinion if he will conform to the established rules. The result is that frequently there is lively argument as to meanings and definitions, and among the preachers it sometimes happens that this argument resolves itself into a debate on questions of infinitesimal distinctions.

The question and answer plan of this class was adopted by Dr. Thomas Hanlon, the founder of the class, and for twenty-seven years its honored leader. The removal of Dr. Hanlon to California several years ago, made a vacancy that was not easily filled. It was a wise and judicious choice that the trustees made in inviting Dr. Munhall to succeed him.

As may be supposed, a great many "trap" questions are asked. These are answered courteously if their nature is such that an answer can be given. If not, they are cleverly turned aside, usually with neat persiflage. The fact that so many of these questions are asked and answered every year has made the Ocean Grove Bible Class famous from Maine to California. J. E. QUINN.

The Prodigal Redeemed

In hearing this story, told by a German lady, I thought, perhaps, it might help some one to have more faith in prayer:

"You know," she said, "my nephew, Chrissy, vat vas so smart? Vell, he got to be an engineer. Got big pay and was doing fine. Then he started to drink, got in bad company, and married one flirt of a womans. She no vife at all for Chrissy. One day she left him and not come back. He drink worse and worse. I get letter from old country from my sister: 'How is Chrissy?' She hear no more from him. Nothing very good I had to tell her. Answer come back, she praying all the time, constantly for Chrissy. Lord save her son! Chrissy den loose his job, get sick down, spend all his money, got to be one good for not any ting. One night he going past one mission in Camden, N. J., the Y. M. C. A. Chrissy went in. He went again and finally he was converted and got on heart to de Lord. I have good news now to write to the old country. My sister write back 'Praise the Lord!' He was sure to answer my prayers.' Now everyt'ing Chrissy do now for de Lord; vas so bad he was, now he that much good!" A. S.

Beginning Again

ONCE in awhile we arrive at a cross-roads station in life. We are obliged to pause, and think which way to go. Sometimes we must begin everything all over again. An illness of the sort that devastates life and cripples energy may produce this effect. The ordinary occupations must be abandoned. What shall take their place? A great sorrow blights the daily joy. A dear presence is lifted out of sight. Instead of the cheery shout, the kindly hand-clasp, the cordial greeting, there is a vacant chair; there is silence; there is an aching loss and loneliness. Here, at life's solemn cross-roads, we must begin again.

The beginning is a test of character. Of what fibre are we made? Is there an underlying steel of resolution veiled perhaps by softness, but there, and may we build upon it? Is there trust in the Heavenly Father? Do we accept his will as always and wholly best? Are we contented to look for his leadings? If so, however feebly, we shall begin anew facing the strangely altered life with composure, and trying to do whatever work may lie next to our hands. The hands may tremble and the heart be faint, but as we toil strength will come. In the time of need it shall be ours.

Work is almost the only panacea for grief, the only refuge from distress, the only lasting remedy for a heartache. Not selfish work, but work done for others, in humility and love, will prove balm for the wounds that have penetrated to the core of our being. Gradually, having begun anew we shall gain fortitude and strength in the way, and be able, wholly compassionate, to understand fellow-sufferers.

A Million Voices

AT last it is beginning to dawn upon the minds of the Mormon hierarchy, that the Women's campaign against polygamy, and for the removal of the apostolic representative of the hierarchy in the United States Senate, is something more than a mere flutter of flags. With an average of ten thousand new signatures to the great Memorial coming in daily from all parts of the Union, it is evident that the women of America are thoroughly in earnest, and mean to speak out in no uncertain tones when the time for action arrives. All over the land, public meetings are being held, at which the speakers unsparingly expose and denounce the disgrace of permitting a sworn representative of the polygamous body whose leaders have openly acknowledged themselves violators of the "laws of God and man," to have any longer a hand in framing the nation's laws.

It is not surprising, therefore, to find that in Utah a very considerable portion of the Mormon following has begun to be heartily ashamed of the situation. These people are honorably disposed to accept and obey the statute laws, and are asking themselves why it is that, since polygamy has been formally renounced by the Mormon Church and expressly forbidden by the Constitution, Utah should continue to tolerate the rule of a handful of unscrupulous men who defy law, honor, truth and morality, and who seem to make a virtue out of their own shame. They defame the fair name of the State, by their official approval of the offences that were exposed by the confessions before the Senate Committee — confessions which, in any other State, would have swept them out of power and public view.

It is for these reasons that the eyes of the Mormon people—the thoughtful, independent citizens of Utah—are opening to the true situation. They are wearied of the intolerable despotism, and the ceaseless tyranny of the hierarchy and its apostles, whose selfishness, greed, and love of lawless indulgence are at variance with all the ideals of the young State. They are especially impatient of the everlasting conflict between polygamy and the law of the land, and they are steadily drifting to the only logical conclusion that can be reached under the circumstances:—that the whole abnormal, un-American system represented by this politico-social, tithing, money-making, lawbreaking machine must go! The Old Man of the Sea must be shaken off the neck of the young State, that it may assert its dignity and self-respect, and assume its rightful place in the great American commonwealth. And the first step toward this emancipation, which the women of America have set out to accomplish, is the removal of the Mormon who now incongruously occupies a seat in the National Senate. With a million voices, they will demand it when the session of Congress opens.

Their programme is a startling one, and the carrying out of it is pretty certain to make history.

The Northland's Danger

SWEDEN and Norway are still wrangling over the proposed dissolution of the Union, and it is feared they may yet come to blows. Sweden has demanded the demolition of the forts on the Norwegian frontier, and the demand has evoked such a storm of disapprobation from the other side, that, for the moment, the warlike attitude of those descendants of the ancient vikings has somewhat startled Europe.

But in these days of peaceful arbitration, there are better ways at hand of settling national quarrels than killing off the surplus population, raising the taxes, and filling the land with helpless orphans and widows. Our choleric friends in the Northland, with the terrible example of Russia and Japan in view, will think twice before plunging their countries in a war which can only result in widespread devastation and untold human suffering, with long years of sorrow and hardship to follow.

King Edward of England is credited with high ability as a diplomatist. Why cannot he, or some other peace-loving prince, suggest a means of amicable adjustment? Perhaps the young Queen Wilhelmina, hostess of the Hague Conference, would accord a welcome in the historic "House in the Woods," to representatives of the two discordant Powers.

Sweden and Norway stand well in the foremost rank of the world's intelligent, orderly, law-abiding peoples. In this educated, utilitarian age, it would be criminal folly for their statesmen to rekindle the embers of dead fires and revive the warlike spirit, over a quarrel which can be honorably and satisfactorily adjusted by pacific means. By arbitrating their differences, they will give to the world a new and valuable object-lesson, and will do more to add to the glory, prosperity and happiness of their countries than they could do by any military campaign, however brilliant.

Ministerial Vacations

LETTERS have recently been published in influential daily journals, complaining of the absence of clergymen from the city pulpits. They represent the pastors as going away to enjoy themselves, regardless of how their congregations fare in their absence. Criticism of this kind appears singularly harsh and unfair. The minister is entitled to his annual rest, and his congregation benefits by the renewed vigor with which he returns from his vacation. His travel broadens his mind, gives him an opportunity of seeing what is done in other cities, of studying new methods of church work, and of reflection, and of making plans for new activities. To continue ministerial service the year round in one pulpit, without a break, is to invite dullness, lassitude, and the production of sermons "flat, stale, and unprofitable." The use to which the consecrated minister puts his vacation, is to gain fresh strength, physical and mental, that he may return invigorated for better service.

The complaint comes with singular bad taste from the pew. It is the fact that during the summer the congregations become so small that suggests the absence of the minister. The ladies of the family are usually away altogether, and the fathers and brothers join them at the beach or the mountains for a day or two, as frequently as their business permits, or they go away for Saturday and Sunday to take a vacation by themselves. Any one visiting the railroad depots, or the piers of the excursion steamers on a Saturday afternoon during the summer, will see how large is the exodus of business men. If the pastor were in his pulpit, his congregation would be meagre. As a matter of fact, arrangements are generally made for union services by the churches of a district. The one church in which they are held, for the convenience of eight or ten churches, is seldom filled, though a contingent from each church contributes to the congregation. It is natural to infer that the congregation at the union service represents all the church-goers in that section of the city. It is better that the should be all together in one church, than be scattered under the ministration of various pastors.

But vacation time is now over. Pastors and people are back in their city homes and the church life is resumed. What shall it be? If the vacation has been of the right kind, the energy and devotion to Christ's cause that will be manifested, should be intensified multiplied and increased. In pew and pulpit alike there will be evidences of new force and vitality. The pastor's efforts to reach outsiders will be seconded and supported by his members and the old Gospel will, as in former times, exert its mighty power. The world needs Christ in these strenuous times, as never before, and he is still able to give the rest and peace that can be found nowhere else. Let the ministers preach him and the members exhibit him in their lives, and there will be a glorious harvest of souls.

The New Grand Army

THIS month, throughout the country, from the Pine Tree State to the ever-pleasant shores of the far-away Pacific, there has been heard the tramp of the new Grand Army of the Republic, the millions of children of Columbia, on their way to school.

At no other time is one who wishes well to his country more gratified than at this time, when there is brought clearly before him the wonderful work carried on by that institution on which all free governments must rest—the public school. When the schools opened this fall, there were more demanding admission, a far larger number of pupils than has been recorded in any past year. From the great cities comes the unanimous report "not room enough," but room will be made, and we are glad of this convincing proof of the service public education can render the people, and the interest they are taking in the matter.

The foreign sections of our great towns are not a whit behind our "West Ends" in their appreciation of an education. It is one of the first things the immigrant learns here, that he must send his children to school. At first he balks. "They must work," he says; but soon he sees that in this enlightened "Land of the Free" even our workmen must know their "three R's," or they are left behind in the race for a bare existence. So, soon he is one of the most insistent that the children of his family enter the race for knowledge with his American neighbors, and, as a usual thing, he sees that the children do their best.

As long as our present system of free education continues to flourish, we need have but little fear that the future watchman of the Republic will cry other than "All's well," for there will break upon his ear that great march of young citizens on their way to school.

Economy

IT is cheaper to pay your honest debts while you have the money, than to stave them off to accumulate and crush you in the end.

It is cheaper to make an honest effort to reform a man who has "gone wrong," than to neglect him and let him drift into a life of crime.

It is cheaper to spend the necessary funds in keeping a city clean and sanitary, than to fight disease that is sure to arise from filth and evil conditions.

It is cheaper to educate and make good citizens of our neglected waifs, than to leave them to grow up as incapables, paupers and criminals.

Those who contend that the "negro problem" is a hopeless one, for the reason that the race is incapable of real culture or permanent self-support, will find food for serious thought in the article which appears elsewhere in this issue. If, after forty years of freedom, the negro has accomplished so much, it is within the limit of reasonable possibilities that, ere another generation passes, his full emancipation from ignorance, and social and industrial dependence may be everywhere recognized.

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Earthquake in Italy

SAD scenes of death and desolation are described in the reports from Calabria, in Southern Italy. The earthquake, which passed through that whole region on September 8, worked more damage than the early accounts indicated. As the reports came in from the outlying districts, the ghastly total of horrors mounted. It was found that at least ten villages had been utterly destroyed, and fully fifteen hundred persons had been killed. Besides these, an enormous number had been severely injured by falling walls, and a still larger number were homeless and starving. Other villages, scattered through the three provinces comprised in Calabria, had suffered more or less seriously. At Mileto, Pizzo, Cessaniti, Conidini and Zungeri, the destruction was extensive. Many of the houses completely collapsed, and those which resisted the shock, are so out of plumb that they will have to be rebuilt.

Materials for a scientific explanation of the phenomenon are lacking at present. It is known, however, that for several days before the convulsion the volcano Stromboli had been in violent eruption, and Vesuvius had renewed its activity. Suddenly, at about three o'clock in the morning, there came a severe shock of earthquake that lasted eighteen seconds. It had an undulatory motion, rocking the buildings from the foundations. Most of the people were in bed and had no opportunity of escape.

It is estimated that over a hundred thousand persons were rendered homeless by the catastrophe. Many of them have erected rude huts from the debris of their homes to shelter them from the weather; but others have fled from the neighborhood, fearing a recurrence of the shocks. There was danger for a time of starvation, but subscriptions were raised for relief and distributed by the military authorities, who were quickly on the scene. The Pope sent the munificent sum of $40,000 and other high personages contributed large sums. The King of Italy set out for the province in an automobile immediately on hearing of the trouble. He visited every village, giving relief, and arranging, as far as possible, for the erection of tents and shelters. It is said that many of the villages will not be rebuilt, as the district has been noted for earthquakes for centuries. The soil, however, is so fruitful, that the people are not likely to desert the province, even if they had the means to leave. A committee has been appointed by the king to consult with architects and prepare plans for houses best adapted to withstand the earthquake shocks. It is hoped that by this means it may be possible to avert fatalities so dreadful, in future earthquakes. No protection, however, can avail altogether. Earthquakes are phenomena so uncertain that none can tell where or when they may come. It is not surprising that the philosophers of old should have attributed them to God himself.

Who shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble (Job 9: 6).

MESSINA AND VIEW OF THE COAST OF CALABRIA, THE SCENE OF THE EARTHQUAKE

A Japanese Disaster

One of those strange accidents to which battleships are liable in peace as in war, has befallen the famous vessel, from which Admiral Togo issued his orders in the memorable sea-fight in which he annihilated the Russian admiral's squadron. The Mikasa was lying at anchor on Sunday night, September 10, in Sasebo harbor, when the watch noticed smoke rising near the base of the mainmast. The fire spread with great rapidity, and despite heroic efforts to check the flames, they reached the after magazine, which exploded, blowing a hole in the port side of the vessel below the waterline and causing her to sink. Unhappily, numbers of men had been sent on board from other ships in the harbor to assist in putting out the fire, and these perished, with many of the Mikasa's own crew. Various conjectures are current as to the cause of the fire, which is under investigation. Some attribute it to an overcharge of electricity. Great relief was felt throughout Japan when it was learned that Admiral Togo was not on board the ship at the time of the fire, but the disaster has cast a gloom everywhere. The Mikasa, being Togo's flagship, was greatly prized by the people. It is believed that six hundred officers and men must have died in the disaster. Some were killed when the magazine exploded and the rest went down with the ship. It is one of the ironies of life that the vessel should have passed safely through the terrific battles of the war, to perish in a time of peace, in a home harbor. So has it sometimes been in the lives of men. They survive the attacks of enemies, but fall when they are off their guard before some insidious sin.

When they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh (I. Thess. 5: 3).

Warned by a Dog

In the upper part of New York City, a five-story apartment house caught fire a few days ago. There were fifteen families, aggregating sixty persons in all, in the building. All were asleep, for it was between three and four in the morning. Suddenly a dog belonging to one of the tenants on the top floor became uneasy, and began barking loudly. His owner went out to pacify him and found the room full of smoke. Looking over the banisters, she saw that the whole staircase was dense, and little hungry streaks of flame were licking the woodwork. Meanwhile, the dog's bark aroused tenants on the next floor, and his mistress added her screams to the noise. Soon everyone in the house was aroused, but only for the people on the lowest floor was there a possibility of escape. The lowest stairway was burning fiercely. From the upper windows the people were crying lustily for help. A policeman on the post heard and turned in an alarm. Soon there were a dozen engines on the scene, sent in response to an urgency call. The firemen swarmed up the ladders, sending down first, all who were able to go alone. Then they began to carry down unconscious women and children. It was all done so expeditiously and bravely, that at last not a soul was left in the building. The last group had been one of a whole family, the children having to be passed from hand to hand by the firemen on the ladders. A continual stream of water from the nozzle of every engine poured on the burning building. When the fire was brought under control, the owner of the dog to whose barking so many owed their lives, missed it, and begged that search be made for it. It was too late then. The poor creature was found on the top floor, burned to a crisp. In the hurry and panic no one had thought of saving the poor beast, who was unable to save himself. Yet now that their danger is past, perhaps there are some who may give a grateful thought to the animal whose sagacity saved them from a horrible death. Better still will it be if the experience turns their attention to that sublime self-sacrifice of Him of whom it was said:

He saved others; himself he could not save (Matt. 27: 42).

Why he Resigned

The politicians in Washington, D. C., were astonished last week, when the announcement was made that William F. Powell, the minister to Hayti, had resigned. He belongs to the colored race, and it was supposed that he would cherish a feeling of pride in being the accredited representative of the United States to a foreign government. He gave, however, a sufficient reason for desiring to quit the office. He said: "During my eight years' experience in Hayti, I have witnessed about fifteen revolutions, and I have had several very narrow escapes during uprisings of the natives. On several occasions I have nearly become the mark for stray bullets. I am afraid the next time one of these bits of lead might find its mark." It is quite natural that the minister should value his life more than even an office so honorable as this. Life is too precious to be risked for such a prize. We can but wish that people would carry the comparison further. They frequently cling to positions of profit or honor, although they realize that their souls are endangered by holding them.

What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? (Mark 8: 36).

Suicide Through Remorse

A strange suicide took place in North Dakota last week. A miner's body was found suspended from a tree in a lonely part of a ravine in Wallace County. A piece of paper pinned to the breast revealed his identity. It simply stated that his act was the result of a crime committed thirty years ago. It was the murder of a girl, and the horror of it had preyed all that time on his soul. The worst feature of it was that an innocent man had been tried, condemned and executed for the murder. A ranchman with whom the guilty man had worked, said when the suicide's body was found, that he was not surprised at the act. In a talk with him, he told him what he had done, how he had gone from place to place, unable to find peace or rest. Remorse had racked his soul, and he was continually brooding on his awful guilt. That he had allowed another man to be executed in his place, only to bear thirty years of misery and at last die by his own hand, is sad testimony to the Nemesis of sin. How true is the warning uttered long ago, but still in force:

The way of transgressors is hard (Prov. 13: 15).

THERE was held last month in New York City a unique gathering, and one of which all patriotic citizens were justly proud. It was the annual Convention of the leading colored business men of the country, both North and South. It was difficult to believe that the parents of these alert and practical business men were, fifty years ago, ranked as personal property. Throughout the Convention the prevailing idea was that the colored people had found the solution of their main difficulties by proving to the white people that they were good workmen, could be good men of business, and, in consequence, good citizens.

PROF. W. HYNES

A brief summary of the mere figures shows that negroes now own church property to the value of nearly forty millions; farms numbering over 140,000, with a value of nearly half a billion; homes valued at $350,000,000; personal property worth nearly $200,000,000; and libraries with a total of over 300,000 volumes, valued at $400,000,000. There are over 800 negro physicians, and nearly 600 negro lawyers, and hundreds of negro ministers. Many banks are conducted entirely by negroes; a score or more of magazines are edited and published by negroes; a number of books have been written by negroes; and over 500 newspapers are under negro management. Since the war, the negroes themselves have raised over $10,000,000 for their own education, and they have 160 institutions for the higher education of their race. Out of a total negro population of 8,000,000, they have about 2,000,000 in the common schools; 40,000 students in higher institutions; 20,000 students learning trades; over 6,000 students pursuing classical, scientific and business courses; and over 30,000 teachers.

"You must remember," writes a negro physician and druggist, of Charleston, S. C., "that business qualifications among us are not hereditary. In the business field the negro has from the start labored under disadvantages. First, he was without special training, such training being impossible on account of the prejudice against him among white business men. He was ignorant of his stock of goods and the best methods of disposing of it, or where to buy to the best advantage. Rebates and discounts were to him unknown quantities. Second, lack of capital. Most negroes who have acquired wealth are loath to invest it in a business venture, the management of which is in the hands of negroes who are without training in that particular business. This makes stock companies of negroes rare, though several of my race have acquired independent fortunes as financiers. Third, prejudice against negroes. While this militates against us, I am happy to say it is gradually dying out. I mean that white people are more and more patronizing places of business run by negroes. Under these conditions, it is obvious that success comes to a negro in business only after a much harder struggle than that which confronts the white man. The colleges are now turning out many negro graduates who are ambitious to enter business life, and with these recruits well equipped intellectually, the race will make a much better showing in industries and in trades."

A glimpse of some of the successful negroes of this country, individually, reveals some interesting personalities, and some striking examples of the negro's capabilities in bettering his condition. In Boston, for example, is a negro owner of a large tailoring establishment, J. H. Lewis. He employs thirty men, and all reports show that he is a substantial and worthy citizen. Then there is Charles Banks, cashier of a negro bank at Mound Bayou, Miss., with clearings amounting during some months to $200,000. Mr. Banks was a delegate to the National Convention at Chicago from his Congressional district. The city in which he is a leading citizen was itself colonized by a negro, thus forming a town composed of negroes owning over 12,000 acres of land and doing a business among them of over $50,000 a year. The Mound Bayou Bank is the second bank organized by negroes in Mississippi, the other being at Vicksburg. The only colored man in the United States who has succeeded as an exporter of lumber is W. H. Johnson, of Bainbridge, Va. Mr. Johnson conducts a large export walnut log business between the country and Germany. His story is a most interesting illustration of the versatility of the colored man. After losing several large fortunes in learning his business, he has at last succeeded in establishing a well paying enterprise, and has high standing on both sides of the Atlantic. Another shining example of negro achievement in the South is that of Lewis Winter, of Nashville, an old man, who employs some thirty persons in a large produce business, and who shipped $50,000 worth of produce to the North in the first six months of last year. Winter rose from slavery to be one of the leading produce dealers of Nashville. He was the first American to land American produce in Cuba.

There is a colored man in New Orleans who does an annual business of $25,000 in the manufacture of springs and mattresses. This is Z. T. Evans. He started business some years ago with ninety dollars capital. He employs both white and black hands, has his own engine and power, and is recognized as one of the substantial business men of the Crescent City. In Louisiana, too, a negro plantation owner raises some 700,000 pounds of sugar yearly.

One former member of the school board of Brooklyn, is a negro named S. R. Scottron, whose business is the manufacture of household wares of onyx and agate. One of the wealthiest colored men in the country is Samuel Diggs, a junk dealer, of Kansas City. A negro named Junius B. Groves has the significant title of the "Black White Potato King." One of the most distinguished of the young orators of the negro race is the Hon. W. H. Lewis, a Harvard graduate. In Jacksonville, Fla., the negro citizens built a street car line of their own, patronized wholly, I believe, by colored people. Their leader was R. R. Robinson, a negro. In regard to business in connection with churches Rev. W. D. Chappelle, of Nashville, Tenn., Secretary of the African Methodist Sunday School Union says: "When we started in business here for the African Methodist Church a few years ago, we had no machinery, and all our work was done by our white friends of the Methodist Church, South. Now we are doing that work ourselves, and our receipts for one year were $35,000."

Let us see what the negro has accomplished in certain localities. The city having the largest negro population is Washington, where colored society includes poets, authors, teachers, composers, musicians and government clerks. Alluding to the prosperity of a certain class of Washington negroes, Mr. I. K. Friedman, author of By Bread Alone, has written:

"If you are still doubtful of the capabilities and possibilities of the colored race, visit the colored high school. Spend an hour in conversation with its cultured teachers, inspect the work of the classrooms and laboratories, listen to the recitations in the sciences, in the languages and English literature, inspect the artistic drawings, watch the faces of the young men and women beaming with intelligence, surcharged with interest in their studies; note the perfect deportment—do these things in a spirit that knows no prejudice, and you must leave the building with the feeling that the powers of education have no limit."

The colored people have a horror of poverty in the day of sickness and death. Hence it is not surprising that we issued more than 85,000 certificates of membership up to the beginning of the present year. The organization has carried sunshine and happiness into the homes of thousands. Many a family has been saved the humiliation of asking assistance from others. The State has been saved thousands of dollars in expenditures for charities, annually, by this and similar companies. We employ more than 400 young men of the race in our various offices."

"In banking, several negroes have risen to important positions," says T. H. Shorts, President of the Bank of the Galilean Fishermen, of Hampton, Va. "Our bank now owns its own property, with burglar and fire-proof vaults. The bank property is worth $20,000; the insurance department has had a wonderful growth, and the bank itself has an authorized capital of $100,000. The total value of all our property in Hampton is $35,000."

Agriculture, of course, claims the largest number of successful negroes; for, as tillers of the soil, negroes are at their best. A prominent negro farmer in the South is R. L. Smith, of Paris, Texas, who organized the Farmers Improvement Society, its objects being the abolition of the credit system, better methods of farming, co-operation in buying and selling, care for the helpless, and ownership of homes. Mr. Smith writes: "We have a membership of 4,000, who pay taxes on a million dollars worth of property. The organization has just bought sixty-three acres of land, as a site for an agricultural school for young negroes. We urge the discussion of agricultural questions, and have now some 200 branches in Texas. All other farmers' movements, both white and colored, in this State, have grown out of this one. The attitude of the whites towards the movement has always been cordial and helpful." Mr. Smith has represented his county in the Legislature of Texas in two terms and is now a Deputy U. S. Marshal.

Among negroes who are tradesmen or storekeepers, a favorite business is that of the druggist. There are over sixty negro druggists in the country—perhaps many more than that—owning stores worth from $600 to $5,000.

Of all those who are helping the negro to attain wealth and position, the greatest is Booker T. Washington. One little story of how he founded the Tuskegee Institute is of interest here. A call for a teacher came from Tuskegee, Alabama. Washington—who was then at Hampton—was given the post. In a shanty, on the Fourth of July, 1881, with thirty pupils, he founded the Tuskegee Institute. Even while he addressed his pupils, the condition of the "Institute" building was such that he had to hold an umbrella over his head as a protection against the inpouring rain. The next day he mailed a letter to General Armstrong, of the Hampton school, asking a loan of $500 for a new building. The General responded with a check, and Washington and his pupils determined to build the building themselves. They even made their own bricks. But when it came to burning the bricks they had to stop—no one knew how to fire a kiln. They could not spare a cent of their $500 for labor, yet they had to burn the bricks. Washington owned a gold watch, a prize won at Hampton. He pawned it, and with the money thus obtained, hired experienced workmen to fire the kiln. The property of the Institute now includes 2,500 acres of land and ninety-eight buildings, large and small, where more than 1,000 colored young men and women are receiving an education under the direction of nearly 100 teachers.

At a meeting of the National Negro Business League, Dr. Washington said: "The fact that there can assemble in this beautiful State capitol building, in Nashville, hundreds of colored men and women, from all parts of the country, representing nearly every line of business in which the white man is engaged, is an indication of growth which is more potential and helpful than much abstract argument. The race that can produce such an assembly of men and women, after only forty years of freedom, is one to be proud of. We shall succeed in winning our way into the confidence and esteem of the American people just in proportion as we show ourselves valuable to the community in which we live, in all the common industries, in commerce, in the welfare of the State, and in the manifestations of the highest character."

A Study of Divine and Human Nature

International Sunday School Lesson, By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

WE can imagine Darius writing such a confession as this: "What a spectacle I have made of myself! A 'god'? No, a fool. Can I blame those officers of mine who proposed that I should proclaim myself 'god' for thirty days? No, I have only myself to blame for being so easily duped. I cannot fall back on the fact that the great Nebuchadnezzar and others before him made 'gods' of themselves, and sent out proclamations for the people to fall down and worship them. I should have been deterred from such foolishness by their example. I ought to have suspected some sort of a plot, when such a proposition was made to me. But my vanity was tickled by the compliment. Oh, yes, I would be a 'god' for thirty days.

"I hesitated not an instant when the proclamation was placed before me for the affixing of my seal. I noted the great satisfaction of the officers who had brought the instrument to me. I was vain enough to think they delighted in the increased honor that was to come to me. Ah! I know now too well their sinister motive—they did not mean honor to me, but death to my favorite minister, the aged Daniel. It was all made clear to me when they came with a complaint, after a few days, that Daniel regarded not the decree, but continued to pray to his God three times a day as he had done aforetime; prayed even with his windows open, making no secret of doing it. What a fiendish gleam was in their faces as they came to me with the charge, claiming that the penalty for disregard of the decree, which was that the offender should be cast into the den of lions, should be meted out to Daniel. Ah, how bitterly I realized then that I was their tool. I recognized that for envy they had thus plotted against Daniel. Theirs was a deep-laid scheme.

"For hours I sought to devise some plan by which I could escape from condemning Daniel. But towards evening the officers came upon me with renewed declarations, basing their demand on the fact that the law of the Medes and Persians is unalterable. So I gave the command that Daniel should be cast into the den of lions. Coward that I was, I assured him that the God he served would be able to deliver him! How my heart smote me as I saw him borne away, an old man, nearly ninety years of age, and the most trusted officer in my kingdom. I was left alone, my envious officers going to the den to see that the order was fully carried out.

"Sleep was murdered for me that night! I was in the depths of shame and despair. As soon as it was light, I hurried to the den with the faint hope in my heart that Daniel's God had indeed been able to keep him safely. I cried out to Daniel as I stood at the mouth of the cave, and he answered me. Yes, he was alive! 'O, King, live forever,' was his greeting. And then he said in a loud voice: 'My God hath sent his angel and hath shut the lions' mouths, and they have not hurt me.' Then I had great joy in my heart, and I commanded that Daniel should be released from the den. And when I looked at him, there was no hurt to be found upon him. Ah! I was as glad as I had been sad before.

"I lost no time in punishing those who had betrayed me into such foolishness and wrongdoing. I gave command that they themselves should be cast into the lions' den. Then was the hunger of the lions appeased. I made haste to prepare a proclamation that the God of Daniel was the true and living God, to be worshiped throughout all my kingdom. All that troubles me now is that I ought to have meted out a different punishment to the officers who betrayed me, for I am taught of Daniel that those who serve the true God leave vengeance to him."

Illustration and Application

"Human nature is the same in all ages," and so we may study ourselves, as in a mirror, in this thrilling story of envy, pride, and courage. Are we envious, like those who plotted Daniel's overthrow? Or proud like the king who was led by flattery to folly? Or courageous like Daniel, because living ever "in the great Taskmaster's eye?"

I. How Envy Leads to Hatred and Murder. Doubtless the politicians of Persia, who envied Daniel because he excelled them in honor and office, were, some of them his own schoolmates in the civil service academy, where the test was made between those who fed richly on meat and wine, and Daniel's band of simpler diet. In school and after, "plain living and high thinking" had won. But the "fat-witted" and fuddled officers were not content that the nation should have the worthiest in the highest place. They envied what they could not equal. They desired the office, not as an opportunity to do good, but for selfish honor and power and indulgence. Envy should be killed the moment it appears in the heart, for otherwise it grows to hatred, which the Bible declares to be murder. Shylock says: "Hates any man the thing he would not kill?" Hatred is the "malice aforethought," that makes the difference between manslaughter and murder. Sometimes hatred is too cowardly to strike the blow, but in God's sight, "he that hateth his brother man is a murderer." Those conspirators in Babylon were too cowardly to assassinate Daniel and so run the risk of capital punishment for themselves, and therefore they meanly plotted to make his courage the means of his death. Thus ever the coward hates the hero, whose fearlessness puts his own fearfulness into shadow. Cassius, in Shakespeare's "Julius Cæsar," is a powerful picture of envy, with his "lean and hungry look." "Such men are never at heart's ease while they behold a greater than themselves." So Joseph's brethren brooded with envy on their brother's goodness and his consequent popularity; and envy grew to hatred and intent to murder. Let us rather hate envy, and kill it at first sight.

II. How Pride is Led by Flattery to Folly. In Absalom we have an early case of political flattery working on pride with murderous intent (II. Sam. 15:1-6), but in that case it was not a king but the common people who were fooled by the political flatterer, as they have been often since then—a reminder that pride and flattery may do their tricks on the poor, no less than on the rich and titled. Indeed "pride and poverty" have been unequally yoked in every age. We have seen it in many others—have we not seen it also in ourselves? Let us ask our hearts, in the words of Lincoln's favorite song:

O why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

And let us probe our pride with the Bible's question, "What hast thou that thou didst not receive?" Instead of going up to the temple with the Pharisee to brag, "O Lord, I thank thee I am not as other men are," when we are really not thanking God, but only boasting, let us put real thankfulness in place of pride, and say, as we look at others less upright or less successful, "But for the grace of God there goes myself." What are you proud of? Your clothes? Those who made them so skilfully in factory and tailor shop have more reason to be proud than those who merely wear them. Or are you proud of a fair face or of strong and graceful form? Probably these are mostly to be credited to your parents. Or are you proud of your property? Even if you earned it by "honest sweat," the men who made it possible for you to do so by great inventions, and by the development of civilization—"in what a forge and what a heat"—are more to be congratulated than you who had "reaped in joy" what the pioneers "sowed in tears." The things we are proud of are ever the things for which we ought to be grateful. Even when office comes, let us thank God and our electors for the "opportunity," rather than the "honor." Let us not be "proud" of successful sons and daughters, but rather "thankful for them," as we have often said before, and shall need to say again and again.

"A god for thirty days!" What a caricature is this not alone of pride but of superstition! Such a thirty-day god recently developed in twentieth-century Philadelphia. A shadowy effigy of the Virgin Mary was reported to have mysteriously appeared for several nights recently on the wall of a house in Philadelphia. Hundreds of people hurried to see the marvel. On the second night people came from all over the city. On the third night the lame, halt and blind were brought to be cured, and many kneeled in the street and worshiped the figure. The great crowd blocked the cars in the street, and the greatest excitement prevailed in the neighborhood. The police had to be called out to quell the miniature riot which took place between the pious and the scoffers, and to clear the way for the trolley cars. It was found that the rays of an electric light were reflected from a bay window on one side of the street, and thrown on the side wall of the house on the opposite side. A lace curtain in the bay window gave the reflected shadow the appearance of a draped woman's figure kneeling in an attitude of prayer. The suggestion that the figure was the image of the Virgin, spread like wild fire. Truly, as Shakespeare says:

Some there be that shadows kiss:
Some have but a shadow's bliss.

III. How Trust Leads to Triumph. In this final chapter of Daniel's great life, we see how "the child is father of the man." Daniel began right as a boy when he first came to Babylon (Dan. 1). He resolved at the start that he would do as the Babylonian ought to do. It takes great courage for one boy, or a few, to challenge the wicked customs of a school. Hobson's greatest claim to American appreciation is not his daring to sink the Merrimac under the guns of the Spanish forts of Santiago, but his daring to stand out against the custom of firing rounds of foul stories in the club life of the Naval Academy, for which he was boycoted for two years by his classmates. But clean living and high thinking won at last in his case as in Daniel's. A team of athletes from St. John's college, Shanghai, defeated a team from a Confucian institution. The victors stayed to "eat rice" with their rivals. There was a moment's hesitation before the meal began; then one of the St. John's men stood up and his comrades with him and said grace. An unusual episode after an athletic contest. The Confucians could not well take exception to the quiet performance of an act of duty. Many an older Christian has not their courage.

There are places where it is still perilous to pray. In China, after the Boxer massacres, a Christian man was found who had been beaten almost to death and left to die. He said to those who condoled with him, "Is it not enough that the disciple should be as his Master?" His daughter soon afterwards offered herself for baptism. When asked, "What if you should suffer as your father?" she quickly answered: "Has not the Lord said, 'Blessed are the persecuted; rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven?'" In our own country the devil's people do not persecute us much for praying. We are more likely to encounter sneers and worse, if we stand for righteousness against the greed for money and the greed for pleasure, as, for example, when professing Christians seek to use the Sabbath for money or amusement.

McLann's Repentance

BY J. WILSON CLAY MISSIMER

THE sun had long been pouring its brilliant rays through the little window in the kitchen, when Jim McLann staggered from his ngy room.

His hair was uncouth and bedraggled. is long black beard, matted and dirty, sted on his breast. As he entered the tchen, walking by the help of every air he chanced to come across in his urse, his eye fell upon his wife, sitting the stove in the corner. He paused unadily, and gazed at her with his swollen, eared eyes.

"Got breakfast ready?" he asked gruffly.

The woman started as from a reverie, d pointing a long, bony finger at a table the centre of the room, made answer in low, soft voice, whose music seemed to ate on McLann's nerves.

"That is all there is left in the house."

He approached the table. "Humph! ll there is! Where's Tom?"

"He's gone out," the woman answered.

"Where?"

"I—I do not know."

"You lie!" thundered McLann, drawing step nearer. "You lie, and you know it! his is the ninth Sunday morning that he's en going away. Where's does he go?"

The miserable woman arose from her air, and, coming over to her husband, t a hand on his arm.

"O Jim!" she said, "won't you, O won't ou be good to me? I've been so wretchd for the last six years. I—"

McLann roughly pushed her away.

"None of your soft voices around me!" e growled. "Where's Tom? You'll tell e where Tom is, woman, or I'll break very bone in your body!"

His wife shuddered, and a mighty sob ook her frame. "Tom's at church!" she id at last.

"Church! Church!" shrieked McLann, What is he doing at church? I believe ou're lying to me, hussy!"

"No; no, I'm not!" wailed his wife. He sings in the choir at St. Thomas' hurch."

The silence that followed this last retark was almost unbearable for the poor oman. What would he do? In his rage e might kill her. But death was better an this life with a merciless, cruel brute or a husband. But there was her boy. Her fair lad of eleven years, with his light air, his honest blue eyes, his pink cheeks, nd his soft, pathetic mouth. What would appen to him if she should go? O, if—.

But the man's voice interrupted her. "Where is this church?" he asked; and he other thought that she detected a softr sound in the hoarse voice.

"On the corner of Fulton and Light streets."

For a brief second McLann stood there, s if undecided as to what course he should ursue. Suddenly, he turned, and taking is dirty hat from the hook on the wall, he eft the house.

McLann paused a trifle in front of the hurch, and gazed up at its mighty and majestic steeple. Then he glanced up and down the street as if to assure himself that none of his acquaintances were near to see him enter, and sheepishly slunk into the vestibule of the church.

Seeing doors ahead of him and not liking the piercing gaze the ushers were putting upon him, he pushed through these swinging doors and found himself confronted by an almost countless number of pews and people. McLann took a back seat, the last in the church, and tried to look calm under the suspicious eyes that were directing their glances at him.

He gazed at the tall pillars, he noted the beautiful memorial windows with their saintly pictures, he was impressed by the dazzling whiteness of the altar in the distance, and he was even interested in the people about him. They had ceased to gaze now, and were sitting, faces to the front.

Suddenly the organ burst forth in wonderful billows of sound, that fired McLann to the depths of his very soul. It inspired him and seemed to carry a message to his black, hard heart. He was filled with a desire to do better, with a longing for sober days and nights, with a sorrow for his poor wife in the hovel at home. But all at once the music ceased, and a great zeal and earnestness seemed to leave him.

But in the distance he heard a deep bass voice, chanting a prayer. "O Lord, open this day our lips, to the worthy praise of Thy holy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord." "Amen," sang the choir, and then the organ once more began to play. McLann started violently. The hymn was one he used to sing when he was a boy.

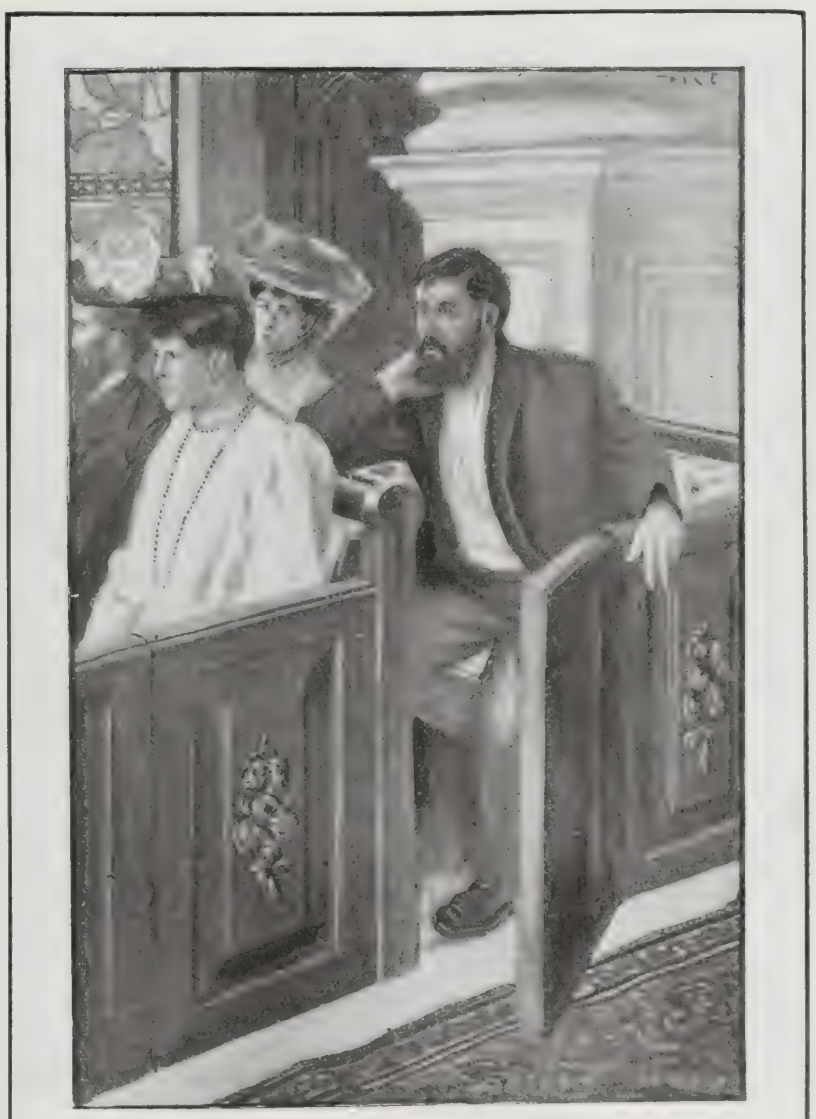
Go, labor on! enough, while here,
If He shall praise thee, if He deign
The willing heart to mark and cheer:
No toil for Him shall be in vain.

Go, labor on, while it is day!
The world's dark night is hastening on:
Speed, speed thy work! cast sloth away!
It is not thus that souls are won.

Toil on! faint not! keep watch and pray!
Be wise the erring soul to win!
Go forth, into the world's highway!
Compel the wanderer to come in!

As the choir sang the word wanderer, McLann though the hymn must have been sung this day for him. But the choir went on:

Toil on, and in thy toil rejoice!
For toil comes rest, for exile home;
Soon shalt thou hear the Bridegroom's voice,
The midnight peal, "Behold I come."



"A SMALL, CHILDLIKE VOICE . . . . . ALMOST TOOK MC LANN'S BREATH AWAY"

He reached out in front of him and took a hymnal from the book-rack and found the place. How those voices stirred him no one knew, and how that forgotten hymn burned into his brain he alone can tell. It brought back old memories. He could see his mother sitting to the right of him, he could hear his father's deep voice singing at the left of him. Behind, he imagined he could hear old Mrs. Lang's sad voice, singing her praises to her God. He raised his rough hand to his face and wiped away a tear, and then another and another. He was crying silently, but the tears would come and he could not stop them. And the choir went on with the hymn, while every word struck deeper and deeper into McLann's heart.

McLann could never distinctly remember what took place immediately after that hymn had ceased? He had a faint recollection of singing and prayers and then singing again. But of that sermon he never ceased to talk.

As the minister ascended the pulpit, McLann marked how tall he was, and how neatly his fair hair hung over his temples. And then the firm, sharp mouth opened, and this was the text he took for his sermon, and that McLann has never forgotten: "The Lord is loving unto every man." And in his sermon he pictured the ever loving Christ, and how he is always willing to receive sinners no matter how low and base they are. How a man can always repent and be saved. To McLann, it seemed as if it were God himself talking, instead of one of his ministers. Again the poor drunkard's tears flowed, but he did not mind them now. He cared not for the curious gazes of the people, he cared not for his uncouth and tough appearance. This sermon and service were for him.

And when the preacher had done, he announced the offertory. But McLann heard him not. He was thinking about his own base life. He was reminding himself that he was the wanderer the hymn had spoken of. Great resolutions were forming in his mind and his eyes burned with an ardent, determined look.

Suddenly a voice, small, childlike, pathetic, ascended to the sky and held people spellbound, and almost took McLann's breath away. It was Tom, his little boy, singing. The climax of McLann's repentance had come. As those beautiful notes and lovely words fell upon his wide open and longing ears, he bent over and buried his face in his hands. His little boy sang:

Come ye disconsolate, where'er ye languish;
Come to the mercy seat, fervently kneel;
Here bring your wounded hearts, here tell your anguish,
Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot heal.

Joy of the desolate, light of the straying,
Hope of the penitent, fadeless and pure,
Here speaks the Comforter, tenderly saying:
Earth has no sorrow that heaven cannot cure.

Here see the bread of life, see waters flowing
Forth from the throne of God, pure from above;
Come to the feast of love, come ever knowing,
Earth has no sorrow but heaven can remove.

And then the voice floated away into silence.

For a long time McLann sat, his face buried in his soiled, dirty hands, and great sobs shaking his frame. The people leaving the church reminded him that it was time to go.

In the street he waited patiently for his little son. He minded not the idle stares of the passers-by, or the suspicious glances of the churchmen. He was waiting for his little boy. The boy who had saved him and brought him to himself. The boy who was four times the man that he was.

At last he came, from around the side of the church where the choir room was, and some people smiled as they saw this dirty, tattered clad man catch up this little fellow in his arms, and cover his face with kisses and tears.

"My own boy," poor McLann kept saying over and over. "My own boy."

They walked home hand in hand. The man with his poor and torn clothes, his blear eyes and red nose, his ugly beard; the boy with his bright, manly little face, his deep blue eyes, his fair hair, and ever and anon gazing up into his father's face with an inquiring look.

When they neared the little hovel, McLann took the lad into his arms again and carried him thus into the house.

The mother still sat at her place by the fire, her head in her hands. As these two entered, the lion and the lamb, she looked up with a startled, curious gaze, as if her eyes were deceiving her.

Jim walked to the middle of the room, and silently put the boy down. Then he walked over to his wife and put a hard, roughened hand on her shoulder.

"Mary," he said, "I—I—have been to church and I—" Tears were coming now, but McLann let them flow free and fast. "I—heard our little boy sing. And I Oh I—" But she was in his arms, sobbing as though her heart would break, and burying her careworn face on his shoulder.

Thus they were reconciled. Thus the angel of peace and repentance brought light and comfort to this little tumbledown hovel, and proved the words of the scripture, "The Lord is loving unto every man."

When the man and his wife dried their tears and looked for their little son, their pride, their joy, they saw that they were the only ones present in the room. And on searching further, McLann found him lying on his scanty quilted cot, crying tears of joy and gladness.

Our Household Circle

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Children's Home Work

ABOUT this time in the year, the household settles down to the routine that, more or less steadily, will guide its doings for the fall and winter. As the children, vacation a thing of the past, attack their studies with new and eager zest, a portion of the evenings must be set apart for study. The ideal conditions are fulfilled when all study is finished during school hours; but when children are in the grammar or the high school, it seems hardly possible for them properly to prepare for recitations unless some time is given to books and number-work at home. Number-work, by the way, is just plain arithmetic, and is apt to be a very confusing and perplexing proposition to parents, who find that the new rules and methods are very different from those they were familiar with in days gone by. Still, if a father or mother happens to be well-grounded in the principles of any science or study, the home work of the children in that branch will be aided by a judicious lift here and there, and the new methods will somehow fit into the old, without a palpable awkwardness.

But, dear, baffled mother, will you suffer a word of unasked advice? Do all you can to further the children in their home tasks. Provide a good light and a quiet room. Prevent unnecessary interruptions. Insist that a faithful effort be conscientiously made, so that tasks assigned by the teacher to-day, may be carried in well-done to-morrow. All this you may do. On the other hand, if your child be overworked, if Marjorie or Elsie stoop over the table with flushed cheeks and a throbbing head, if Louis or George is in despair, and cannot without evident nervous strain accomplish what he undertakes, call a halt. Neither children nor parents ought ever to be fretted and worried and wearied over home work, or school work either. When they are, a mistake has been made. If Jack can learn half a lesson perfectly, but cannot master the other half, his lesson is longer than it ought to be by that much. A growing brain should never be unduly forced.

Many a promising youth has been a disappointment in maturity, because of a foolishly stimulating process in the early years. That a lad has gone forward from class to class with rapid strides, is a matter of congratulation only when physical and spiritual development have kept pace with mental growth. There is no particular gain in hurry, yet we Americans hurry our children from the cradle onward, as though the only desirable thing in life were, at the soonest moment practicable, to push them into manhood and womanhood. Far wiser is it to retard the progress of a delicate child than to hasten it too rapidly.

Neither girl nor boy should sit down to study so soon as school is over for the day. Afternoons in the short daylight we now have are to be utilized for play, or for play or recreation; for wholesome enjoyment of some sort. Blessed is the lot of the country boy who has "chores" to do about the farm. Happy is the girl who can help mother to prepare supper and clear it away, before she sits down to her evening study.

What we all need is a development that makes us practical, yet detracts nothing from our higher life. Children should have a serene life. Often they have the reverse. They are scolded and misunderstood. Too much is expected of them. Their individuality is cramped. Or, on the other hand, they are coddled, petted, and indulged, until they become tyrants, and lose the true perspective. Whoever is a parent needs daily to seek guidance from above, since the training of children is the most delicate and the most important of earthly undertakings. A good deal of this training goes on in our evenings at home.

Summer Shopping

Shopping is at all times a delight to the feminine heart. Men do not half know the pleasure women find in looking over stuffs on the counters, in feeling the softness and smoothness of fine linen, and in choosing ribbons and chiffons for the adornment of pretty young daughters. Summer shopping has its advantages quite beyond those of the more crowded seasons. For instance, in a big town like New York, there is a moment when many of the residents are away and the large department stores are less thronged than at other seasons. One sees many strange faces just then in town. People have come from the South and West, merchants to buy goods, tourists on their way to Canada and Nova Scotia, and frugal women from the suburbs, who have discovered that between seasons is the most economical time to make purchases. Notwithstanding this influx of folk from the outside there is ease and freedom in going about, finding clerks at leisure to wait on one, and accomplishing what is always a sort of triumph, the picking up of bargains here and there.

After the first rush of a season is over, there are remnants of dress goods which may be bought for much less than their original cost. Sheeting and table linen are now marked down, and the mother who is doing her last errands for the daughter who is to be married in the early fall, goes home at night after the shopping of a summer day well contented with the day's work. If she live out of town, she has had an agreeable trip, unless her choice has been one of the furnace-heated dog days. Then indeed the summer shopping is tedious, and the shopper returns a wreck.

"Own, if you can, one of those welcome faces
That brings the sunshine into shadowed places."

It's worth while, dear friends, to try the magic of tender, sunny smiles. Don't go around looking gloomy. A gloomy mood makes a gloomy countenance, and even children hurry away from it. Be cheerful when things go wrong. The darkest day, live till to-morrow, will have passed away. Heaven help the home where father and mother have forgotten to look cheerful.

The Open Fire

HOW it leaps, in dance excited,
How it sleeps, in trance delighted,
How it looms in golden shining,
How it glooms in wan declining
While around the hearth we gather
One and all;
In the bleak and windy weather
Of the Fall!

Friendly flame, remote Chaldean,
Seers of name effaced, Sabæan,
Shepherds of the elder ages,
Persian bards in mystic pages
Thee adored, and thought divinely
Streamed thy light,
Symbol pure they did enshrine thee,
Spirit bright.

Friends, how dear each heart remembers,
As in cheer we stir the embers;
Bid the ash renew its beauty,
Sparkle, flash, and grow till duty,
Mid the comfort of the hour
Woos our soul;
And we deem its sternest dower
Life's best goal.

So we dream, not visionary,
When we deem thee missionary,
Household fire, once more relighted,
Blazing higher the while united Round the hearth of home, we gather
One and all,
In the bleak and windy weather
Of the Fall.

Concerning the Pantry

Although pickles and preserves may i these days be purchased over the counte though they are of excellent quality an fine flavor, and, considering the troubl they save, are by no means dear, yet th old-fashioned housekeeper still prefers t stock her pantry with her own home-mad products. She likes to select her frui and examine peach, pear and quince wit the utmost care. She is more than fastid ous about the exact moment when th onions, cucumbers and peppers should b placed in pickle; about the precise numbe of minutes that syrup should boil, or frui remain over the fire, and the filling of th cans, their sealing and labelling is worl for a lady's hands. When the rows o glass jars stand on the pantry shelves wit the perfume and the flavor that mother' preserves always have, the family ar aware of a certain pride and complacency It is only good housekeepers who neve fail with jams and jellies, whose preserve never ferment, and who always have ready the foundation for a toothsome desert, o a gift pleasing to a convalescent. Th memories of our childhood are sweetene by the thought of the luncheons and din ners we once ate with such appetite as i no longer ours; we found bread and butte a feast when pound-for-pound peaches in their thick syrup were added, and we asked nothing better when currant and raspberry jam topped off a frugal meal. Some of us ask nothing better now. An abundant provision of sweet or tart preserves, and plenty of crisp pickles will give the home table a crowning excellence when wintry winds are chill.

A Lost Dog

In the streets of a great city or on a suburban road, no sight is more pitiful than that of a lost dog. It is more pathetic than the sight of a lost child, for the human misery is sure to appeal to some friendly passer-by, while, strange to say, the lost dog has as many foes as friends. People regard the poor brute with suspicion. He is hungry and dirty and thirsty and masterless; he, the most companionable and loyal of beasts, belongs to nobody, and, like Ishmael, finally he is against every man, because every man's hand is against him. Poor waif and stray. That a man who has once owned a dog and known a dog's devotion, can deliberately leave so dependent a creature to the hazards of fate, simply shows that some men are less worthy than many beasts.

Converted in Prison

Mr. E. Eben Bayliss, of Boston, a commercial traveler, and Chaplain of the Order of Gideons, has been staying in New York City for a short time, and has made several very effective addresses at the Bowery Mission.

The story of Mr. Bayliss' life, which he has outlined below, is of such remarkable interest that we give it for the benefit of the readers of this journal:

Born in England, of highly respectable parentage, with the very best of environment, and the strongest possible inducements to live a true and unselfish life, he ran counter to all the pure home associations, and preferred a wild, wilful, sinful career. He was the "black sheep" of his family. Before he was ten years old, he ran away from home to accompany a professional juggler and conjurer, as his "Jack-under-the-table;" and was traveling in that capacity for over three months before his father learned of his whereabouts. Upon returning home, his conduct and constant disobedience were even worse than before. For various offences he was beaten and confined at home, and finally arrested and sentenced to two months in jail and three years in the Reformatory. While the boy was undergoing his sentence, his father died. Shortly afterward the young culprit enlisted in the British army. Then began a reckless career. Twice he deserted from his regiment and once filed his way out of the guard-house. For repeated misbehavior he was imprisoned, and twice branded and severely flogged. For aggravated insubordination, he was finally sentenced to six years penal servitude. In prison, he was converted. The prison cell became a very Bethel to his soul. The Bible was diligently and prayerfully studied. Prayer was a genuine delight; and growth in grace and in the knowledge of the truth was manifest to all with whom he came in contact.

After his release, he was returned to the army, at Sheffield, Yorkshire. His old carousing, drinking and gambling comrades, who remembered him as the dissipated profligate and blasphemer, gathered to greet him, but he informed them of his change of heart. They jeered at him, but he persevered in the "new and better way." Gradually he gained the confidence, respect, and affection of the men, and was used in bringing blessing to many among them. Out in the city, in the missions and upon the street corners, also in the churches and at Mechanics' Hall, he witnessed for Christ.

After serving a year in his regiment, he purchased his release from further military service, and went to college for a brief period. In 1868, he entered upon home mission work. Since coming to America, he has been instrumental in gathering the material for organizing three churches; has superintended the erection of two church edifices; the building of two parsonages; the founding of an academy; and the holding of evangelistic services, in connection with which many men and women have been brought to the feet of Jesus. He is now sixty-three, yet hale and hearty, and ever ready to speak the word of cheer, of comfort and of salvation, and to persuade the wanderer to come to that Saviour whose love has so wonderfully redeemed him and transformed his life.

ASK AND YE SHALL RECEIVE

LEAVE the burden that you bear
With your gracious Lord:
Cast away your doubt and care,
Rest upon his Word.
Take this promise to your heart:
"Ask, ye shall receive."
One condition on your part:
"If ye will believe."

Ask for vital, living faith.
Faith that will prevail:
Ask, believing what He saith,
Cannot, cannot fail:
Ask Him that his wondrous grace
Cleanse your heart from sin,
And the sunlight of his face
Dwell and shine within.

Though He seems to tarry long,
Yet his Word is true:
Let your heart break forth in song,
He will answer you:
All unknown how it will come,
All unknown the day,
Yet within his own good time,
In his own good way.

Mightiest forces are his own,
And you are his child:
He will make his presence known
In the tempest wild:
Trust Him, though you may not see
Answers in your day;
For the sun, the air, the sea,
All his will obey.

Trust Him, with a childlike faith,
Claim each promise rare,
Doubting not in life or death,
You are in his care;
And the souls so dear to you,
Are to Him more dear:
Leave them at his blessed feet,
With no shade of fear.

Pittsfield, Me. MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

That "Sun-Light" Effect.

Many soaps, made especially for use in shampooing, are positively injurious. They may cleanse the scalp, but they darken the hair.

Ivory Soap is the only soap you should use. It gives blonde hair that peculiar "sun-light" effect, while in the case of dark hair, it intensifies the gloss.

There is no "free" uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

PRINCE LOUIS NAPOLEON — OSCAR STRAUSS — CHARLES F. HUGHES — HON. ROBERT BACON

PROMINENT MEN OF THE HOUR

HON. ROBERT BACON has been chosen by President Roosevelt as Assistant Secretary of State. Mr. Bacon was born on Cape Cod, and at Harvard was a member of the President's class. They have always been firm friends since their college days. He entered a banking house in Boston, and later coming to New York as an associate of Pierpont Morgan. In New York he became known as a far-seeing financier and practical man of affairs.

CHARLES E. HUGHES is conducting the great insurance investigation in New York City, that is being watched with great interest by State Commissioners of Insurance, legislators, and policy holders, both in this country and in Europe. He has drawn forth some astonishing facts, concerning the way some of the great international companies conduct their business. To be selected by the Legislative Committee of the State of New York, places the stamp of public approval on Mr. Hughes' distinguished legal career. He is the son of a clergyman, and was destined for the pulpit, but later inclination led him to teaching, and the law. He received his education at Colgate, and Brown Universities. He is a trustee of the latter institution.

OSCAR STRAUSS headed a committee of prominent Hebrews that called upon Envoy de Witte, to urge better treatment of the Jews in Russia. The committee was well received, and M. de Witte promised that he will do his best to have them put on an equal footing with the other subjects of the Czar. As M. de Witte may soon be premier, this promise is of great importance.

PRINCE LOUIS NAPOLEON, a General in the Russian Army, has been appointed Governor-General of the Caucasus. He has not played an important part in the late war with Japan, but is said to be a good officer, of executive ability. He is a relative of the late Napoleon the Third, and, in consequence, a near relative of our Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Charles Bonaparte, of Baltimore.

Mont-Lawn's Season Ended

PITY the children of the poor
Who've never plucked the daisies:
Who've never watched the skylark soar
Or heard it singing praises;
Who've never trod the fresh green sward
Or rambled by the river;
They need a holiday, ye rich!
May God reward the giver!

Pity the little pattering feet
That swarm in fetid alleys,
And grimy hands that might be sweet
'Mid cowslips of the valleys;
Pale lips that might turn rosy red
Where free fresh breezes quiver:
Provide them holidays, ye rich—
And God reward the giver!

Pity the little bright blue eyes
That never saw the ocean,
Or gazed with innocent surprise
At wild waves in commotion:
Send, send them forth one happy day
To hill, or sea, or river;
'Tis much to them, but small to you—
And God reward the giver!

THE fields are beginning to look a bit brown at Mont-Lawn. There is a hint of autumn in scarlet patches here and there among the trees. The last merry load of youngsters have climbed the hills, finished their ten days' vacation, and regretfully turned their faces cityward, with good-byes shouted back from grateful hearts as the stages bore them away. The big dining-tent no longer resounds to the merry clatter of spoons, forks and childish voices.

William, the "chef's," occupation of cooking daily for two hundred and fifty hungry little ones, is gone. In the dormitories, the little white cots look lonely, as if they missed the curly little heads which for so many weeks had pressed the pillows. The faithful teachers and caretakers have gone about other tasks in the busy world.

The care and love which Housemother Collins gives the little children is shown by a recent incident. Johnny had never been away from home before. He was only five years old, and his mother, poor as she was, and unable to give her darling an outing, had some misgivings about Johnny's going so far from home. When the little fellow had been gone a few days, the mother's anxiety increased to such a pitch that she determined to go to Mont-Lawn, and see how the boy was getting on. So, one night, long after the last bedtime prayer had been said, and everyone was sound asleep, there came a loud knock at the door of the Main House. Miss Collins, who sleeps with one ear and eye open, watchful of the wants of her little charges, heard the knock and went to the door.

"What do you wish?" she asked of the woman standing there.

"I want Johnny D——," she replied.

She was asked to come in and explain why she came at such an hour and upon such an errand.

"Why, you see," said the mother, "I got to thinking about Johnny and how lonesome he must be without me, I was so lonesome without him; an' so I took a train an' come up to Nyack, an' I had to walk from the village, an' it was dark, an' I lost my way; but I got here at last, an' "—here her voice went off into a wail—"I want my Johnny."

"Come with me," said Mother Collins. Leading the way, the two women entered a dormitory, which held a number of tiny white cribs. Approaching one where a curly-haired boy was sweetly sleeping, his rosy cheek pressing a little pink palm, they paused.

"That's Johnny, sure," said the woman.

"Don't waken him too suddenly," said Miss Collins, as she bent over the sleeping child, tenderly lifting the little form.

Two little loving arms clasped the matron's neck; a little face nestled close, and a sleepy little voice said, "Don't wake me up, please; I 'so s'eepy," and away went the wee one off to dreamland again.

The mother looked at her boy, lying so rosy and sweet in the little Housemother's arms. She bent and kissed him, and with a voice choked and trembling, she said, "Put him back. I am satisfied. If he sees me, he may cry; but I have seen him, and that is enough. I go back home happy, to wait for him."

And the mother of the one little child, and the heart-mother of many hundreds, stole softly down the stairs.

CALLED HIGHER

"At eventime it shall be light." Mrs. Sangster in writing to young women of growing old, advises them to commit much of the Scriptures to memory, then if old age comes with weakness of sight, they may have treasures laid up in memory. It recalled to me a dear old lady, whose beautiful home near the Hudson with a devoted son and his family, was all that could be desired. As the old lady passed into the nineties, her sight grew dim until darkness and light were alike to her, and the mind weakened: still she could repeat whole chapters of the Bible and the old familiar hymns. She ever spoke of "the dear Lord" as visibly present with her. Often she said: "It is so good for children to learn the Bible verses. When I went to Sunday School, we learned the whole chapter containing the lesson: and now that I cannot see to read, I can repeat them to my comfort." Her daily prayer was: "Come, dear Lord, and take me home." After many months of weary waiting, the only realities to her being the days of youth and young wifehood, beside the things unseen which are eternal, "we watched her breathing soft and low as we looked through the sunset gates," and by faith saw the blind eyes opened, and the rapturous meeting with her Lord and her loved ones, she had remembered to the last.

PRISCILLA.

The news of the sudden death of Mr. Green T. Dodd, at his home in Atlanta, Ga., came as a shock to his many friends in that city. For fifty-two years he had been an active, energetic, pronounced citizen of the Gate City; always full of life and energy, always genial and never depressed. The church, to which he has given a life's allegiance, will mourn one of its most efficient workers, while wife, sons and daughters will find a vacancy that nothing—not even kind recollections—can fill. He was for many years a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

J. S. T., West Orange, N. J. In the International Teachers' Edition of the Holy Bible, I find the name of Tristram referred to as one of the authorities in regard to the annuals and plants mentioned in the Bible. Where are the writings of this person to be had?

Rev. Henry Baker Tristram, D.D., canon of Durham, is referred to. He is a recognized authority on Oriental matters and a copious author. Write to him at The College, Durham, England, about his books.

M. A. S., Newark, N. J. Do you really believe, that if the persons mentioned in Matt. 12:31 as being beyond the pale of forgiveness repented, they would not be forgiven?

You have Christ's own statement, and there can be no higher authority. The sin, whatever it may have been, probably excluded the possibility of repentance. If it consisted really, as most expositors believe, in ascribing the work of the Holy Spirit to the power of Satan, the persons who committed it would be inconceivably base. That such persons could ever repent is most unlikely. The inference which is most important in these days, is that the fact of a person repenting of sin and seeking pardon, is proof positive that the sin he has committed is not the unpardonable sin. "He that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." The man who has committed the unpardonable sin is so hardened that he has no inclination to seek pardon.

E. A. B., Dale, N. D. Are the reorganized church of Latter Day Saints the same as in Utah? If not, why do they hold to the Book of Mormon?

No, they are not the same. They not only disavow polygamy absolutely, but they also repudiate nearly all the principal doctrines peculiar to the Utah church. See outline of their creed in our issue of Sept. 6.

H. D. S., Denver, Colo. I am asked why, if God is omnipotent, he did not prevent our first parents falling into sin. Can you help me to an answer?

In creating man, God designed to produce a race of a higher type than any existing—beings who, while endowed with the power of falling, voluntarily chose the good. You cannot imagine a race being of the highest type if it was coerced into goodness. For example: A boy may have been keep at home so strictly that he has had little chance of going wrong. He has been kept from knowledge of the wickedness in the world and every fault has been severely punished. He is comparatively innocent. But his character is not so strong as that of a boy who has been out among the temptations of the world, has fallen and repented, and having learned the consequences of wrong-doing, afterwards resists temptation and leads a virtuous life. God did not intend to produce a race of slaves, but a race endowed with reason, capable of resisting evil, responsible for their actions. That could not have been if he had interposed, and by his almighty power compelled them to remain innocent.

A. G. L., Haverhill, Mass. Where and when did the Millerites go forth to meet Christ?

The Millerites (Second Adventists), in October, 1844, assembled at several places, expecting the coming of Christ and the end of the world. In some instances the groups wore ascension robes of white. A group of two hundred and fifty met outside of Philadelphia, and were overwhelmed by a terrible rainstorm. See Life of William Miller.

W. B. K., Ohio, Miss. How do you explain the statement in Luke 24:33 and 34, that the brethren reported the appearance of Christ to Peter, when he was one of the eleven?

The verses do not appear to represent the two men as reporting it. They say that the two men, returning from Emmaus with their story of having seen Jesus, found the eleven assembled, full of wonder at the news that Jesus had appeared to Simon. To them, already amazed at Peter's report, the two disciples tell their own story of their intercourse with Jesus on the way.

W. F. W., Saratoga Springs, N. Y. Who wrote the poem, "The Man With the Hoe"?

Edwin Markham. He was born in Oregon City, Ore., in 1852. When quite young, he settled in California. He was for a time a blacksmith. The poem mentioned gave him wide fame, and since its publication he has written a number of others.

A. A. B., Lowell, Mass. Did Dr. Talmage ever make the statement that eighteen years of the life of Jesus were spent in India? If so, where did he get his authority?

Dr. Talmage, in one of his sermons, stated that Jesus may have spent some years in India, but that there is no certainty about the matter. One writer places our Saviour during some of the years of his life, of which we have no account in Scripture, in Tibet. These theories, however, are mere speculations, and are nowhere recorded as facts.

Mrs. F., Portland, Ore. Is Susan B. Anthony a sister of the late Henry Ward Beecher?

No; she is the daughter of Daniel Anthony, and has never married nor borne another name. She has no relation with the Beecher family so far as we know.

E. R. R., Madison, Wis. 1. Who was Dow Jr.? 2. Where can I get a copy of his Patent Sermon?

"Dow Jr." was the non de plume of Elbridge Gerry Paige, an American humorist, who was born at Hardwick, Mass. His active life was spent in New York City and in California. He died in 1859. 2. His sermons can be found in any city library. We know the name of no firm that now publishes them.

Miss E. M. McP., Troy, O. Who compiled the Catholic Bible?

The translation of the Old Testament sanctioned by the Roman Church, was published by the English College, at Douay, France, in 1609, and the New Testament at Rheims, in 1582. It differs from the Protestant Bible in the methods adopted in translation, such words as "repentance" being rendered "penance," and the interpretation or commentary by Catholic writers is also very different from ours. The compilers had access, of course, to all authentic sources, but the translation and interpretation differ widely from ours.

R. W. Cranbury, N. J. What two men hold the first place in both England and America, in letters, poetry, and art?

In America, William Dean Howells in prose literature, John La Farge in art, and John Whitcomb Riley in poetry. In England, John Morley in letters, Charles Algernon Swinburne in poetry, and Sir Edward John Poynter in art.

B. H., Chester, Pa. 1. What was the origin of the Indians found here at the time of the discovery of America? 2. How did the custom of Hallowe'en originate?

1. It is an unsettled question whether the American Indians originated on this soil or in the Old World. No argument on the question could be regarded as decisive and it will, without doubt, always remain a mystery. 2. Hallowe'en probably dates back to pre-Christian times, and its origin is veiled in obscurity. As now celebrated, it is essentially Scotch.

Mrs. E. M. Kingston, N. J. In a history, in which are two pictures of Sojourner Truth, I find this statement: "He was in after years the owner of the slave woman Isabel, who, in the full maturity of womanhood, became the world-famed evangelist, Sojourner Truth." Will you explain the discrepancy?

Sojourner Truth was at one time a slave. She discarded her slave name of Isabel, and chose that of Sojourner Truth; Truth as the subject of her lecture message, because she believed it divinely revealed. She was born in 1775, and died in 1883.

H. J., Coeymans, N. Y. What is the exact meaning of the word yeoman?

In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries it was the term applied to an ordinary servant, but after the fifteenth century it was the popular designation for men who were freeholders and tilled their own farms. The term has gradually risen in dignity and many famous Englishmen are proud of their sturdy yeoman ancestry.

R. K., Brooklyn, N. Y. Is it true that wampum is still used by the Indians in any part of this country?

Yes; but to a very limited extent. It is used more for ornaments, such as belts and head decorations. Most of it is made by Germans, near Bergen County, N. J.

Coffee Runs Riot No Longer

"Wife and I had a serious time of it when we were coffee drinkers.

"She had gastritis, headaches, belching, and would have periods of sickness, while I suffered a daily headache that became chronic.

"We naturally sought relief by drugs, but without avail, for it is now plain enough that no drug will relieve the diseases another drug coffee sets up particularly, so long as the drug which causes the trouble is continued.

"Finally we thought we would try leaving off coffee and using Postum. I noticed that my headaches disappeared like magic and the old "trembly" nervousness left. One day my wife said, "Do you know my gastritis is gone?"

"One can hardly realize what Postum has done for us.

"Then we began to talk to others. Wife's father and mother were both coffee drinkers and sufferers. Their headaches left entirely a short time after they changed the old coffee for Postum. I began to enquire among my parishioners and found to my astonishment that numbers of them use Postum in place of coffee. Many of the ministers who have visited our parsonage have become enthusiastic champions of Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

ader, Harrisburg. When did King Zedekiah live?

Zedekiah was the son of Josiah, King of dah. He was placed on the throne out 599 B. C., and he reigned eleven ars. He formed an alliance with Pha-oh-Hophra, the ruler of Egypt, and then volted against the power of Nebuchad-zzar. Jerusalem was besieged; Zede-ah was captured and taken to Babylon.

V. G., St. James, Ill. Is it possible for a person to keep all the Commandments and not be a Christian?

We think Christ himself makes this ite clear when he drew the distinction tween the reign of law under the Mosaic spensation, and the reign of love under e new dispensation. See Matt. 5: 43, , 45, 46; Matt. 19: 20, 21; Luke 6: 27; hn 13: 34, 35; and 15: 12; I. John 2: 7. 9, 10; Galatians 5: 14; Galatians 6: 2, ese and many other passages show that e might keep all the ten commandments d yet, lacking obedience to Christ's new mmandment of love, sympathy and com-ssion (which is "the fulfilling of the w"), he could not be a Christian.

F., Norwich. Who were the Zouaves?

A Zouave is a soldier belonging to a rps of the French light infantry, or-nized in Algeria in 1830, after the nquest of that country by France. It s originally composed of natives, but at esent there are few but Frenchmen serv-g. The uniform is copied from that of e Arabs, and was used in our own coun-y during the Civil War. Ellsworth's uaves were famous at the time.

en A., Passaic, N. J. 1. Why is it that cats are not only no longer venerated in any part of the world, but are held as distasteful ani-mals? 2. What is a "Cheshire cat?"

1. In these days of enlightenment, the t may have fallen into disfavor for var-ius reasons. In old superstitious times e cat was a sort of "familiar" among so-alled seers and witches. In ancient Rome e goddess of liberty was represented with at at her feet, as that animal loves free-m and hates restraint. The Egyptians rshiped the cat as a symbol of the non, being most active and wide awake night. Such considerations have no ight now, and pussy has to stand upon r merits, which are often rather indif-ent. Students of cat-nature pronounce r thieving, selfish, rapacious, ungrateful, d, in most cases, decidedly unsanitary in mes where there are children. 2. Cheese s formerly sold in Cheshire moulded e a cat—hence, doubtless, the saying re-fred to.

J. B. Brooklyn, N. Y. Where do we get the expression chouse (to gouge or swindle or cheat)?

It is not always certain that the true ori-n of a particular word or phrase can be certained. Gifford, an authority on such atters, says that it originated thus: The erpreter of the Turkish Embassy in Eng-nd is called the chiaus. In 1609, a chiaus otted to defraud his government of some ousands of pounds—a big defalcation in ose days. So notorious did the swindle come, that the verb "to chouse" came to popular use to designate a shrewd pt to cheat In one of his plays, written i 1610, Ben Johnson makes a character e the word in this sense.

Miss A. C. B., Freeport, Me. Can you tell me when and where the Young Women's Christian Association originated, and to what special objects is it devoted?

The Young Women's Christian Associa-n in the United States grew out of the adies' Christian Union, established in ew York in 1858. The first Y. W. C. A. s formed in Boston, Mass., in 1866. The cieties are devoted to the spiritual, men-l, social and physical development of ung women.

Miss D. McP. Trenton, N. J. Is amusement a function of the church? If so, why cannot we have concerts, parties, soirees, receptions, and the like? If not, why should we employ half-way measures, instead of giving God the pure, clean, whole-souled worship which is his due?

The question is a very broad one. A urch or religious family has many forms activity besides worship. Some of these rms are social, and are employed to ing the people into closer and better lationship, and to attract strangers. us, while amusement cannot be said to a function of the church, sociability ed not be barred, and whatever will pro-ote it, in a proper way, will help the church in its higher and more serious work. We see no reason why receptions, and even properly organized concerts, should not be helpful. Read the accounts of some of the institutional churches. But fairs, shows, lotteries, sales, and the like, are to be avoided.

GET POWER

The Supply Comes From Food

If we get power from food, why not strive to get all the power we can. That is only possible by use of skilfully selected food that exactly fits the requirements of the body.

Poor fuel makes a poor fire and a poor fire is not a good steam producer.

"From not knowing how to select the right food to fit my needs, I suffered grievously for a long time from stomach troubles," writes a lady from a little town in Missouri.

"It seemed as if I would never be able to find out the sort of food that was best for me. Hardly anything that I could eat would stay on my stomach. Every attempt gave me heart-burn and filled my stomach with gas. I got thinner and thinner until I literally became a living skeleton, and in time was compelled to keep to my bed.

"A few months ago I was persuaded to try Grape-Nuts food, and it had such good effect from the very beginning that I have kept up its use ever since. I was surprised at the ease with which I digested it. It proved to be just what I needed. All my unpleasant symptoms, the heart-burn, the inflated feeling which gave me so much pain disappeared. My weight gradually increased from 98 to 116 lbs, my figure rounded out, my strength came back, and I am now able to do my housework and enjoy it. The Grape-Nuts food did it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

A ten days' trial will show anyone some facts about food.

"There's a reason."

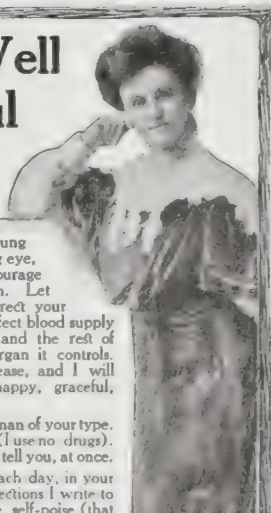
I Can Make You Well Strong and Beautiful



THE REASON I can understand and help you is that I have successfully treated 18,000 pupils, personally studying and prescribing for each one. This experience and study has made it possible for me to understand, from a few symptoms, your whole organism.

The beautiful woman, the cherished wife, the ever-young mother is the woman whose sunny smile, restful and sparkling eye, calm self-possession and graceful poise radiate cheer, infuse courage and command respect. All these are founded upon health. Let me give you a perfectly balanced organism. Let me direct your breathing, your exercise, your diet; let me give you a perfect blood supply and circulation; a nervous system in harmony with itself and the rest of your body, each nerve center properly directing the organ it controls. The resultant strong vitality will enable you to resist disease, and I will make you what you were intended to be—strong, happy, graceful, beautiful—loving and beloved.

Just a little care is all you need to make you the ideal woman of your type. I know it is possible; I have accomplished it for thousands. (I use no drugs). I never treat a pupil I cannot help. If I cannot help you, I will tell you, at once.

Only 15 Minutes a Day Give me 15 minutes of your time, each day, in your own home, by following the simple directions I write to you, and let me give you health, grace, self-poise (that great charm of womanhood), mental calm, life power and true beauty, making your life a satisfaction to yourself, making you the delight and admiration of your friends.

I Keep Women Young Do you think "True Motherhood" means devotion of mother to her family and neglect of herself? True? —No, the true mother is true to her sacred duty of preserving and protecting herself, that she may be of greater service to her family. The mother needs health, strength and lightness of heart that she may be a true wife—the delight of her husband's heart, his joy, rest, social help and inspiration, not a slaving, suffering dead-weight for his pity.

The true mother keeps well, beautiful and young, that she may enjoy the confidence and admiration of her children and be their guide and welcome councillor.

If you could sit beside me, at my desk, I could, if I would, show you, daily, hundreds of letters from pupils I have helped. I never violate a confidence, never show a letter without permission; but here are a few snatches from one morning's mail:

I wish every nervous teacher could know what benefit is to be derived from your physical culture.
I have lost 34 pounds, and was never better. I look ten years younger.
My constipation and biliousness are entirely relieved.
Just think how I have gained, since I began with you, from 112 to 138½ pounds in one year.
My catarrh and lungs are much better and my body, which was a bony crooked structure is actually beginning to look like your picture of correct poise.
My head is steady, the confused feeling having passed away. It is the best spent money ever used for myself.
Just think, Miss Cocroft, before I took up your work I could not eat anything without the greatest distress, and now I think I could DIGEST TACKS. I am so happy.

How to Stand and Walk Remember, I give you personal instruction, after careful study of your symptoms and condition. When you request details about my lessons, I send you my general book free. This outlines my methods, and gives you many valuable health hints. With this book I will send, also free, my lesson on Poise, which teaches you how to stand and walk.

Personal Instruction Besides the Book and free lesson, in answer to your first inquiry, is included my personal examination of your symptoms and my first advice to you. Write me fully about your case, also letting me know your faults of figure, etc. I will then make a personal study of your case and will let you know whether I can help you or not. Your letter will be held in confidence.

I never publish letters without special permission, though I can send you hundreds of testimonials from women I have helped, who are only too glad to have me show their letters.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Peril of the Church*

THE most serious of all the perils of the Church at home, resulting from failure to enter doors of opportunity, is that the largest manifestation of the Spirit of Jesus Christ is withheld from those who do not wholly obey. Therefore, if we would have the irresistible current of the energy of God coursing through the Church in her work both at home and abroad, let us follow with more purpose of heart the pathway of obedience to the missionary command of Christ.

In view of the conditions in the non-Christian world at the beginning of this century, favoring and calling for a great advance movement on the part of the Churches of Christendom, in view of the grave dangers resulting from any save an aggressive onward movement, has not the time come for the Church to give herself with greater earnestness than ever to the stupendous task of making Christ known and obeyed in all the world?

What can prevent such a great onward movement for the evangelization of the world at the beginning of this century? Not the obstacles on the foreign mission field. If there be any failure, it will not be because the fortresses in the non-Christian world are impregnable, but because the attack by our missionary forces is not adequately sustained by the home Churches. Granted the earnest and persevering support of the Christians on the home field, our missionary forces will triumphantly override every obstacle in Asia, Africa, and all other parts of the unevangelized world.

The real problem of foreign missions, then, is in the home Churches, and without the pastor it cannot be solved.

A Text-Book of Music

The Art of the Musician, by Dr. Henry G. Hanchett. This book, the outgrowth of a course of popular lectures, may truly be classed as a text-book for musical students who desire to thoroughly understand music in its many forms. It consists of fourteen chapters on various subjects, among which may be mentioned, "Art and Music," "The Materials of Music," "Thematic Development," "Counterpoint and Fugue," "Form Building," "Classical Music," "Romantic Music," etc., which subjects are all treated in a masterly manner, illustrated by musical examples from Handel, Beethoven, Bach, Wagner, Liszt, Schumann, Chopin, Schubert, and others, with an evident leaning toward Beethoven. While the author aims at the highest form in music, yet he says, "It cannot be doubted that many persons derive much pleasure of a perfectly innocent sort from the drummings upon pianos, the tootings of the street band, and the wheezings ground out by the organ man. The familiar air scraped from a fiddle by a blind beggar will start a dozen children to singing the words with evident enjoyment, and the shallowest and most flippant of Gospel hymns, if it but attract from the slums to better influences, the degraded mind to better thoughts, is in just so far and to persons of such attainments, educative, uplifting, artistic." We could easily quote pages from this book, but a perusal of the whole will be far more satisfactory. 327 pages. Price $1.50. Macmillan & Co., New York.

The Burden of the City: by Isabelle Horton. This is one of the books of the Home Mission Study Course, and will be invaluable to any one who takes an active interest in the problems presented by the congestion of hundreds of thousands in our great cities. The author is superintendent of social and educational work in the Halsted Street Institutional Church, in Chicago, and writes with the knowledge gained from long experience. Among the subjects considered are settlement work, the modern church and its method, deaconess work in city missions, children's work, and co-operation. Published by Fleming H. Revell Company, New York, Chicago, Toronto. Price, 50 cents.

Mission Problems, and Mission Methods in South China, by J. Campbell Gibson, D.D. In this interesting volume, facts are told clearly, arranged scientifically and interpreted fairly. It takes in the entire horizon of missionary effort, with the result that we have a book which comes as near as possible to giving the real science of missions. The author's wholesome human sympathy, combined with genial humor, makes him a model interpreter of human nature, which he shows is, after all; not so very different whether found in China or America. The volume is lavishly illustrated with photographic reproductions. Price $1.50 net. Published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York.

The Women's Memorial

ETTERS accompanying lists of signatures to the Anti-Mormon Memorial, show that a great awakening s taken place all over the country as to e danger and menace of polygamy. omen are now thoroughly aroused to eir duty, with the result that lists are owing longer, and mails heavier with em.

A list of three hundred and fifty names mes from a small place in Ohio, with ese words of warning:

The Mormons seem to be very numerous in nia; they have a church, and are going through e country trying to get followers, and are aking up homes in different places.

When the women realize what this eans, when it comes so near that they n see what is being done by this false d pernicious doctrine of plural marriage, ere is no hesitation about their exerting l their power to crush the evil. Special etings are being held in churches, to lp the anti-Mormon movement; pastors e not only urging the women of their ngregations to sign the Memorial, but e sending for petitions and are going out individually, getting signatures, en sending them to THE CHRISTIAN HERD, with words of commendation and enuragement. Rev. L. R. Keckler, pastor the M. E. Church, Valley Springs, S. D., nds two lists, saying, "I hope to send ore names later. I am yours for the otection of the home."

Rev. W. T. Boyd, pastor Baptist Church, East Hebron, Mo., writes:

he enclosed list is from the women of East bron Church and Grange. May the Lord pros the work and give the women victory.

Mr. E. Bull, writing from Florida, says:

lease find enclosed Anti-Mormon Memorial. lery woman in our little town (Pomona), with to or three exceptions, signed it.

From Clifton Springs Sanitarium, New rk, comes a long list of names, with omise of more. From Grange gatherngs, Camp-meetings, W. C. T. U. societs and other women's organizations, come ousands of signatures upon rolls of paper rds in length. One list from Grand pids, is headed by the name of the wife a man who was in the Mountain Meadow assacre.

"A Friend to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," nds her second list of names, saying:

have done what I could, and I do earnestly be that we shall gain the victory, and that ygamy will be driven from our land.

Another correspondent says, "We who le among them (the Mormons) know that Hoot should not be allowed to hold his at in the Senate." From California mes a list with these words: "The best I uld do in the busiest time of fruit harvst." "A busy mother of seven little tes," has done her share in obtaining sigatures. Another writes:

am the mother of six little ones, all under nine rs of age, and I want to do all I can to have a nd Christian country for my children to grow in.

There is a note of pathos in a beautifully ritten letter from a Michigan lady, who annot walk. She sends a roll of 176 mes. There are a number of lists conining many hundreds, and some with ore than a thousand names. One lady Pennsylvania sends 1,102 signatures. is was the work of ten ladies of her wn. She writes:

We all worked, for our town contains a little er three thousand inhabitants; so you see we but few houses unvisited. I started and ed the movement here, for I realized the peril country is in if we do not put down this evil. denominations joined in the work. In three urches, the Memorial was read from the pulpit.

From a little place in Missouri come 863 mes, secured as follows—so writes Mrs. M. Boulivare:

The town was divided into four parts: one was en to the Baptist ladies; one to the Methoists; one to the Presbyterians, and one to The ciples of Christ. Committees from each of ese Churches did the work.

Yet there are those who say that women ve no heads for the details of business.

Now that summer vacations are over, d people are returning to their homes om mountain and seashore, various clubs d women's organizations are gathering f the season's work, and much progress may be expected in the Anti-Mormon movement in the next few weeks. The e for receiving signatures has been exended to October 15th, so that all may ve ample time to gather lists. Send for emorials and distribute them among your iends.

THE DEAF ENGINEER of Detroit

HOW HE REGAINED HIS HEARING.

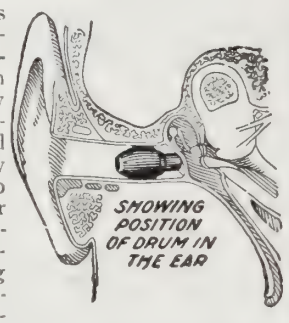
A few years ago there was an electrical engineer in Detroit, Mich., who was so deaf that he could scarcely hear the roaring of his own engines and dynamos.

After an attack of typhoid fever he had noticed his hearing was slightly affected. Years went by with the deafness gradually getting worse in spite of the best treatment and the use of every device for the relief of deafness then known to science, until, as stated above, he had practically lost all sense of hearing.

This engineer was a well-known inventor of mechanical devices and he decided the human ear was nothing more nor less than a piece of mechanism, complicated perhaps, but still just a machine for carrying sound vibrations to the auditory nerve. Then he did just what he would do with one of his own dynamos which was not working right. He experimented in order to find out the best method of repairing or removing the cause of his deafness.

The trouble, as in nearly all cases of deafness, was in the natural ear drum, which was so thickened that it could not catch the vibrations of sounds. The result of the experiments of this clever inventor is the most perfect artificial ear drum the world has ever seen.

Every one who is at all hard of hearing should write to the happy engineer of Detroit. His name is Geo. P. Way and the name of his wonderful invention is "The Way Ear Drum."



These drums are scientifically constructed from a peculiarly sensitized material molded to fit exactly the opening to the inner ear and are entirely invisible. During the years devoted to perfecting his wonderful invention, Mr. Way made hundreds of drums of different shapes and sizes before he got his present perfect drum.

Note in the illustration its peculiar shape — exhaustive experiments have proven that unless an artificial drum has these exact curves the sound waves are not caught as they should be. Note again how the drum is narrowed down to a small tube just where it strikes the natural ear drum. This feature alone is most valuable as it intensifies the sound waves and makes hearing possible even for those who have almost entirely lost all sense of sound.

Remember that these drums are entirely different from any other artificial aid to hearing, and that these features are strongly protected by patents and are found in no other drums except the WAY. If you suffer at all with your hearing write to Mr. Way. He has been deaf himself and knows how you feel. Prominent Detroit business men, after a careful investigation of the merits of Mr. Way's wonderful device, have given strong financial support, and stand behind Mr. Way and his invention. Detroit's best physicians indorse these drums and recommend their use to their patients.

Write a frank statement of how you became deaf, how long your hearing has been defective and how much trouble you have with your ears. Mr. Way will be equally frank with you and will tell you whether or not the Way Ear Drums will help you. Address your letter personally to MR. GEO. P. WAY, 902 Majestic Bldg., Detroit, Mich.

Fidelity Triumphant

By Mrs. M. Baxter

LIKE Nebuchadnezzar and every other wise king, Darius established subordinate rulers, princes, or satraps, and over these, three presidents, of whom the now aged Daniel was one. God had so ordered it that Daniel should be brought out of his obscurity into public notice, just on the eve of the victory of Darius, in order that, in the new empire, he might have his witness; and also that in this new generation of men, as in Nebuchadnezzar's time, there should be a world-wide testimony to the God of Israel. Blessed man, whom God could trust to be his witness in two empires, to two generations.

Darius made the 120 princes accountable to the three presidents, and made them, on their part, accountable to himself. The king found Daniel so much more reliable than any other of his princes, that he "thought to set him over the whole realm." Very naturally it awakened the jealousy of the Medes to see a foreigner, one who was a mere captive of the former king of Babylon, raised to a position which might be envied by the leading nobles and princes of the land. It was intolerable to them. But God makes the wrath of the wicked to praise him, and the remainder of wrath he restrains. He orders or permits all which happens. The jealousy of the princes was God's opportunity with Darius; but it was Daniel's refining fire.

The Median princes instituted an investigation, with the object of detecting some unfaithfulness in Daniel's government. The accounts were audited, and were found faultless. Magistrates were interviewed, and closely questioned how he judged in such and such a case; but all this close inquiry only brought more fully to light the truth, the wisdom, and the faithfulness of the man who had God for his Counsellor: "They could find no occasion nor fault; forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him." Determined to work his downfall, they were driven to a contemptible expedient. Knowing how true Daniel was to his God, and how his faith, instead of being a fashionable convenience, like their own, was the ruling motive of all his life and action, they sought to bring about distrust and division between Daniel and the king on the ground of Daniel's faith in Jehovah. It was an ignoble, mean device. The conclusion they came to was "We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God."

What a testimony! Would to God it could be said of every one of God's witnesses in the present day! If we were asked the question: "What is the greatest hindrance to the progress of the Gospel?" we should say without any hesitation, "The inconsistency of Christians," self-loving, money-loving, pleasure-loving, world-loving Christians! Unkind, backbiting, spiteful, dishonest, crooked Christians! Idle, proud, encroaching, sponging Christians! These ruin the work of the Lord.

With every show of zeal for the establishment of the king's authority, these unworthy conspirators "came tumultuously to the king" (R.V., margin), with the petition that the royal statute should be made, that no man should make any petition to any god or man during thirty days (a whole month), save to the king himself! It was as much as to say the king was the fountain of all power, of all beneficence! This was too strong an appeal to the unregenerate heart of King Darius—it flattered his conceit; he did not see through the motives of these men, for he was not like Nebuchadnezzar, who so deftly caught the wise men of Babylon in a snare. Darius was himself caught: he "signed the writing," and, "according to the laws of the Medes and Persians," it was irrevocable.

Trial and Triumph*

HOW different an aspect does temptation assume when it is regarded as a trial! James must have used the word in that sense, when he bade his readers rejoice, when they fell into manifold temptations. Indeed, the Revised Version gives that, as the proper rendering of the word. A temptation is a trial, and a trial not infrequently involves temptation, but in essence, the two words have a different significance. A Christian may be tried by adversity, by sickness, by bereavement, and when he is undergoing it, he may be tempted to impatience, to rebellion, or to unbelief. Or he may bear it bravely, holding fast his faith. It then becomes an opportunity for him to prove his sincerity and his submissiveness. It is this opportunity that James alludes to when he exhorts us to receive temptations with joy.

It is an error common to all ages of the world to suppose that affliction is always punishment. That most tender and impassioned of books, the Book of Job, is an exposure of this error. Job's friends assumed that he must have deeply sinned, otherwise he would not have been so severely afflicted. The reader, taken behind the scenes in the earlier chapters of the book, knows why one affliction after another was allowed to fall on the devoted man. It was to vindicate him from the aspersions of the enemy of mankind. Had Job known that fact, how much easier it would have been for him to bear the trials that came upon him. It was the darkness, and the insinuations of his friends that made his afflictions so hard to bear.

Who can tell, when affliction falls upon a Christian, why it comes? We know that God does not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men. The Christian under trial does right to examine himself, to find if he has done anything to merit punishment. But if his conscience is clear, he has the right to conclude that some other purpose is to be served by the trial. It may be educational. There may be in his nature some quality that needs to be developed, or some weak point strengthened, or some evil tendency checked. Trial may be sent to perform this office. If the Christian realizes that the trial he is enduring is perfecting his character and fitting him for a higher stage of existence, he has reason to rejoice. There are men whom God designs for some great service, and these are often prepared for it by special trials. Who can tell whether the freedom of Scotland may not in a large measure have resulted from the trials of John Knox? It is not likely that the world would ever have had the good that it has gained from the Pilgrim's Progress if John Bunyan had not been shut up in Bedford jail. So it has been with other great men who have served their fellow-men. The iron has entered into their souls before they were ready for service. Trial is equally efficacious as a corrective. There are people who are liable to become censorious and unmerciful toward an erring brother. Such men are sometimes called to learn by bitter experience the need of the charity of others, to realize how easily men fall into sin and to have to plead for the mercy that they withheld from others. Thus trial becomes a discipline and a means of teaching. In this world we are being educated, and who are we that we should resent the methods our wise and loving Father employs for the purpose.

The triumph of the Christian comes from the way he endures trial. That it is hard to bear is admitted. "No chastening is for the present joyous, but grievous." Nor is the discipline that perfects pleasant to the subject of it. But how glorious is it to submit, not only with patience, but acquiescence, to the will of our God. That is the triumph to bear all, and yet hold fast our faith and love. It is easy, as the enemy said about Job, to serve God when he is blessing us in our circumstances. The test of our fidelity is to cling to him and love him when everything seems to be going against us, when our burdens are not lifted, and even our prayers seem to be unanswered. Yet our Lord sets us the example. He prayed that the cup might pass from him, but later he changed his prayer. "If it may not pass unless I drink it, thy will be done." That is the triumph our Lord achieved, in which his people may follow him.

The Truth About Stoves

By the Largest Makers of Stoves and Ranges in the World

MANY people have been deceived in believing that stoves were cheap because of a low price, when experience proves them the most expensive.

A small price may be paid for a stove which looks attractive in the catalogue, which has been described as "perfect," but it is liable to prove a very expensive purchase; for ten chances to one, trouble will arise from this stove in a month's time—it may not heat or cook properly, or it may consume fuel like a locomotive. Then the material in the stove itself may wear so poorly that at the end of a year or so it will have to be replaced.

You never get something for nothing in this world, and when you pay a small price for a stove, that price must cover the cost of material and labor, and include a reasonable profit, consequently inferior cast-iron and steel, and the cheapest and most inexperienced labor, must go into this seemingly low-priced stove.

Expert Stove Advice Free.

We have opened an "Advice Department," in charge of an expert stoveman, simply to tell the people, absolutely free of cost, all about stoves. And this expert will honestly advise you just which stove or range will best suit your needs. Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

Reader, Osborn, Mo. Will God forgive one who has partaken of the sacrament unworthily, but not meaning contempt? If afterwards he sees how wrong it is, and is sincerely repentant, and confesses to God and asks forgiveness, will he forgive if one tries to live a right life afterwards?

We have abundant assurance of his readiness to forgive all our transgressions, if we only turn to him repentant and confess our sins and ask forgiveness for Jesus' sake. Repentance must be accompanied by a sincere purpose to forsake our sins. The Father's love and pity are infinite, and his mercy is boundless to all who come to him in the right spirit.

H. E. C., Providence, R. I. If the suffering and death of Christ atoned for sin, why may not the suffering and death of the sinner atone for his sin?

The cases are not parallel in any sense. Christ did not die for his own sin, being sinless. He died that men through him might be saved from eternal death. If the sinner rejects Christ, he makes that sacrifice of no effect so far as he is concerned. He deliberately chooses the doom to save him from which Christ died, and incurs a penalty from which his own death does not relieve him. He must die in any case, being a son of Adam, and there is therefore no merit in his death. It cannot atone for sin. The virtue of Christ's suffering and death consists in his divine nature, which rendered his voluntary submission to them a sacrifice of a superior order, which God accepts as vicarious.

J.D.S., Shemill's Ford, N. C. Who are the people represented by the elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal son (Luke 15: 25)?

In the first instance, the Scribes and Pharisees who were angry with Jesus for associating with the outcast and fallen. You remember how they resented his going to dine with Zaccheus. In our time the character relates to men who hold aloof from all effort to convert sinners, who, when a man sins and repents do not welcome him; who are severe on the wrongdoers, and show them no mercy when they try to make a new start in life.

J. G. A., Valdez, Alaska. 1. Who was Madame Guyon, and why was she persecuted so?

She was a famous Frenchwoman, reared as a Catholic, and widely known as a mystic, who had dreams, visions, and marvelous manifestations. She was unquestionably a sincere religious enthusiast. Her writings gave offense to the Catholics, and were condemned by the Pope, and she was confined in a convent, and afterward in the Bastile prison. After her release, in 1700, she retired to private life. She wrote many volumes upon the Scriptures. She gave away her estate, subjected her body to austere privations and spent her days in good works. She believed that only by suffering and privation could the soul be purified. "Her life was a pattern of true holiness," wrote John Wesley, although he did not commend her for her inward impressions, which she called "inspirations."

2. We cannot answer your other questions, and even if we could, our opinions (or those of others) concerning such things would be worthless.

L. A., Lancaster City, Pa. Why do so many philosophers teach that men have no souls? Is there any one who really believes that?

Probably not so many in proportion to the whole population as in former times, but there are always some. It is the old materialistic philosophy that regards man as simply animal. It is contrary to the teaching of the Bible and contrary to the teaching of philosophers, who, apart from Christianity, recognize the presence in man of an immaterial force acting through the brain but independent of it.

Mrs. C. L. T., Va. Have I a right to commune, feeling a strong hatred in my heart toward a person who has done me a great wrong? I have been a member of the church for years, and thought I was a Christian, till this incident occurred. I always attended prayer-meetings, and took an active part in church work, but with this in my heart I don't feel worthy of any such work.

It is sometimes very hard to follow the injunction, "Forgive your enemies," and still harder to "love them"; yet, if we are followers of Christ, we should do his bidding. Even if you know that the offender has done you a wrong intentionally, it may be possible to bring him to a realizing sense of his wicked course, by making him aware of your readiness to forgive. Perhaps the best thing you could do would be to take quiet counsel with your pastor on the whole matter.

S. R. K., Homestead, Oreg. Do the verses about God's choosing people for destruction, in Rom. 9: 15–20, imply that they would not have been accepted if they had repented?

Peter was right in saying (II. Peter 3:16) that in Paul's epistles there were some things hard to be understood. These verses are confessedly among the most difficult. They appear to be contradictory to the conclusion which Paul reaches at the close of his argument (Romans 11: 32) "God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." Perhaps we would understand his argument better if we knew more of the people to whom he was writing. It may have been, that among them were some who had the audacity to criticize God's method of government, and Paul wanted them to realize that God was not under obligation to save any who rebelled against him. That fact we must admit. No man can claim as a right that God shall forgive him. We know, from Paul's own letters, that God does forgive all who come to him in penitence. But when a man defies him, as Pharaoh did, Paul contends that God makes an example of him, that men of all time may see what is the end of defiance of his rule. We do not imagine that Paul meant that God directly hardened Pharaoh, but that the hardening was the effect of the removal of the plagues. The very mercy had the opposite effect on the man that it should have had. Pharaoh misunderstood it, as men now misunderstand God's long-suffering, and think they will escape altogether. Our side of the question is not God's sovereignty, which we can never understand, but the sublime fact that whosoever will may come to Christ and be saved.

Reader, LaFayette, Ga. Does the warning in Hebrews 10: 26, imply that the backslider has no hope of being forgiven?

The statement as it stands in our version, is so contrary to other passages which invite the backslider to return and promise him welcome, that we naturally look for some other explanation of it, for one scripture cannot contradict another. Two suggestions have been made. One is that the passage should read: "There remaineth no other sacrifice for sin." That is, that the backslider must return to the sacrifice he has forsaken. There is no other that will avail him. The second suggestion is that the passage should read: "While we sin wilfully," etc. That is, that the sacrifice does not avail while a backslider continues wilfully in sin. He must renounce his sin and leave it, before the sacrifice can avail him.

S. C. H., McKoy, Ky. What is conscience? Is it always the guide a man must follow in his life?

It is the moral sense in man, by which he judges between right and wrong, and which approves or condemns his conduct. A man is bound to obey it in all his actions. He must, therefore, be careful to see that it is guided by right principles, that it is educated, and is not biased or warped by sophistry, or prejudice, or by impure motives. It has a standard in the Bible which should keep it true and firm. It is, however, quite possible for a man to do wrong conscientiously. Paul gives an illustration (Acts 26: 9) "I thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus." The revelation on the way to Damascus changed that judgment of conscience and gave him a new principle on which he acted. Peter was conscientious in his idea of food and of associating with Gentiles. It took a miracle to open his eyes (Acts 10: 28). The inquisitors were probably conscientious in persecuting protestants; Calvin was conscientious in burning Servetus, and the Puritans were conscientious in executing witches. But we see now, in our more enlightened age, that they erred. When a man is uncertain as to the right course to take, he should pray for guidance and direction, should see what principles the Bible lays down in similar matters, and then let his conscience decide. He will be held responsible for obeying his conscience.

C. E. D., Van Buren, Ark. Please explain second chapter I. Timothy, from the tenth verse to the end.

Paul wrote this epistle from Corinth where the precept he quotes was in full force. It was a usage of the times in which he lived. The prohibition had been emphasized in official canons of the church, and it dealt with social conditions which were peculiar to an age which had assigned to women a life of quiet domesticity, taking no public part in matters political, literary or religious. Besides, there was at that time a condition of morals in Corinth which made it particularly desirable that the women of the Christian church should be modest and retiring, to distinguish them from a class which had made itself offensively prominent and even obnoxious. Thus, the prohibition may be regarded as having had a local reference, and consequently as having little applicability to our own times.

D. G., Tompkinsville, Staten Island. Who was the founder of the primitive Methodists?

Hugh Bourne. He was born in Staffordshire, England, April 3, 1772. He preached in Ireland, Scotland, Canada, and the United States. His ministry was very successful. He died at Bemersly, October 11, 1852.

P.H., Parnesville. What is the Boscobel Oak?

It was an oak tree at Boscobel, Shropshire, England, in the branches of which King Charles II. concealed himself after the battle of Worcester, September 3, 1651. While hiding, he could see the Cromwellian troopers that had been sent in pursuit of him, and even hear their voices.

A. H., Washington. Please name the cabinet of President Roosevelt as it now stands.

Secretary of State, Elihu Root, of New York; Secretary of the Treasury, Leslie M. Shaw, of Iowa; Secretary of War, William H. Taft, of Ohio; Attorney-General, William H. Moody, of Massachusetts; Postmaster-General, George B. Cortelyou; Secretary of the Navy, Charles Bonaparte, of Maryland; Secretary of the Interior, Ethan A. Hitchcock, of Missouri; Secretary of Agriculture, James Wilson, of Iowa; Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Victor B. Metcalf, of California.

HEATHEN GODS OF JAPAN, WHOSE WORSHIP IS NOW DECLINING

Seven of the prominent gods of Japan are shown in this interesting photograph. These idols are, respectively: 1. The god of the rice fields, who is supposed to give a bountiful crop. 2. The god who brings children to bless the home. 3. The god of the fish. 4. The goddess of beauty. 5. The god who confers long life. 6. The god of memory. 7. The god of war. These quaint-looking figures may be met with everywhere in Japan, but it is indisputable that in many places they are no longer held in their ancient repute and veneration.

The Late Dr. T. J. Barnardo

He Was the "Children's Friend"

THE LATE DR. THOMAS J. BARNARDO AND HIS NOBLE LIFE-WORK AMONG THE WAIFS

A Typical Waif

FEW men in any land, in the present age, have done more with their lives, and talents, and opportunities toward the betterment of humanity and the brightening of the "seamy side," than did Dr. Thomas John Barnardo, who passed away in London on Sept. 20, at the age of sixty. Dr. Barnardo's whole career, from his young manhood up to his last hours on earth, was one of the most exalted and consecrated philanthropy. He was known throughout Great Britain and Canada as "The Friend of the Destitute Children," and he had well earned the title, as he had been instrumental in rescuing no less than 60,000 neglected orphan waifs from the streets, slums, and alleys of the British cities, and had trained them and made of them self-respecting and self-supporting Christian men and women. Over 12,000 of these children he placed in Canada and the British Colonies.

To tell the story of Dr. Barnardo's life would fill many columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, many of whose readers, however, are already familiar with its principal incidents. He was born in Dublin, in 1846. When he was in his nineteenth year he was converted, and resolved to consecrate himself to the foreign mission field. But a very different work, though no less important, was in store for him right at home.

He entered London Hospital in 1866, as a medical student. During the years he spent in this capacity he became acquainted with the poor of the modern Babylon, his duties taking him much among them. It was not long before the thoughtful young student recognized his real field of duty. He was then about twenty years of age, and during his medical rounds visited hundreds of the low East-end lodging-houses. On bleak winter night, he saw no less than seventy-three ragged and homeless children lying under a piece of old tarpaulin at St. Paul's wharf, packed together, big and little, like sardines in a box. He soon became aware that thousands of others were faring just as badly, and were growing up to a godless, criminal manhood, if they escaped death by starvation or accident meanwhile. In 1870, Dr. Barnardo made an effort to put his rescue schemes into practical operation, and to provide a home for the waifs. He rented an old house in Stepney Causeway, London, which was soon transformed into a cheerful and attractive "Home for Destitute Lads," and filled it with a number of children gathered in from the dark alleys, railway arches, fruit markets, and river front, where they were surrounded by vicious and criminal associations. From this beginning the rescue work yearly expanded. At the present time, the institutions founded by Dr. Barnado comprise nearly ninety separate Homes and twenty-four Mission Branches. Of these, thirty-four are situated in London, one in the Island of Jersey, in the English Channel, seventy in various counties of England, and three in Canada. They include Homes for Working and Destitute Lads, Orphan Homes, Nursery Homes, All-night Refuges, Labor Houses, Village Homes for Orphan and Destitute Girls, Babies' Castles, Hospitals, Servants' Free Registry and Home, Rescue Home for Young Girls in Special Danger, The Bee Hive (an Industrial Home for Older Girls), City Messenger Brigade, Shoeblack Brigade and Home, Wood Chopping Brigade, Convalescent Seaside Homes, Memorial Homes for Incurables, Homes for Girl Waifs, Children's Free Lodging-Houses, Emigration Depots, Industrial Farm and Home, Boarding-out Branches, Blind and Deaf-Mute Branch, Branch for Cripples or Deformed Children, The Children's Fold, Ever-Open Doors (eight Branches of Rescue Work), and several Shipping Agencies for the sending of children abroad.

A Girl Arab

A Holiday Gathering at one of the Barnardo Homes

There was seemingly no limit to the energies and resources of this wonderful Christian worker. So universally trusted and beloved was he by the benevolent people of London and other English cities, that every new project that he proposed for the physical betterment and moral elevation of the wretched poor commanded instant attention and support. Up to the present time nearly sixty thousand poor boys have been rescued from privation, suffering and moral peril and a large proportion of them placed in Christian households. He established in different provincial centres, new receiving-houses, with ever-open doors, where application may be made on behalf of destitute children. This was necessary, as a considerable proportion of the applicants were from other cities than London, and as they would inevitably drift into the great tribe of hopeless and helpless waifs were not a rescuing hand held out in time. The Triumph of Peace

TEXT: ISAIAH 9: 6—"The Prince of Peace"

THE prophet stood upon a lofty eminence, and looked down the centuries at men and nations playing the tragedy of life on the stage of future years. He saw a great character higher than anything on this side, hiding everything upon the other, the promised Messiah, the Deliverer of the world. He noticed his dual nature, that he was a Son, and yet the Everlasting Father; the Child, and yet the mighty God. He beheld him with the government on his shoulder, and in the climax of his description called him "The Prince of Peace." The prophet saw correctly. Jesus Christ has the government of the world on his shoulder to-day. He dictates the laws, literature, commerce, and religion of most of the ruling empires of the earth.

We have a conspicuous illustration of the fact in the peace just concluded between Russia and Japan. The peace of Portsmouth was brought about largely by one of the most loyal subjects of the Divine Prince, its declarations were founded on the principles of Christ's teaching and life, and its adoption will contribute to the universal conquest of the "Prince of Peace." Japan had been reluctant to draw the sword. The Japanese Government and people had no desire for war. For months they endeavored to settle the international differences by the pen of diplomacy. Baron Rosen and Baron Komura, who became two of the four commissioners at Portsmouth, conducted the diplomatic correspondence designed to avert war. The Czar, who had talked so loudly about the necessity of peace among nations, and had done more than any other one to organize the Court of Arbitration at the Hague, did not want or intend to have any war with Japan; but the Russian bureaucracy, fired by personal vanity and ambition, ignorant of the resources of their enemy, turned the pen of peace into the spear of war.

War's Fearful Cost

When Japan saw that no agreement of honorable peace was possible, and when she saw that while Russia, under pretense of conciliation, was preparing most vigorously for war, she threw down the pen and took up the sword. Then followed one of the most appalling conflicts of modern times, certainly the severest since our Civil War, in which each nation spent about a billion dollars, and in which the Russians lost 420,000 men, and seventy-three ships, worth $150,000,000, and the Japanese 180,000 men, and twelve ships, worth $15,000,000. This fearful damage began Feb. 4, 1904, and continued 527 days, till the Peace Conference.

That Japan should undertake a war with a nation fifty times as large, with three times the population, with a standing army five times as numerous, and a stronger navy, seemed folly to all those who had not an intimate knowledge of her character and history.

The Russians were outclassed from the start. They did not lack numbers of infantry, cavalry or artillery; they had guns of modern make, the best of provisions for their soldiers; they had great battleships; their men were splendid physical specimens with courage of the highest order marching into the jaws of death by tens of thousands, and yet they did not have a single victory on land or sea, and lost more than half of their men and about all of their ships. What was the trouble? The difference between the opposing armies was that of the spirit in the breast of the men behind the guns.

It was a contest of intelligence against ignorance. Seventy-five per cent. of the people of Russia can neither read nor write. In Japan, education is compulsory and well nigh universal. In an imperial edict, some years ago, it was declared that there should be no village with an ignorant family, and that there should be no family with an ignorant member. There are colleges, universities, professional schools of all kinds. There are fifty thousand students in the schools and universities of Tokio alone. There has been a higher type of genius and a better technical training among the leaders in the cabinet and in the field than among the Russians. They planned each campaign in advance to the minutest detail, leaving nothing to chance and no contingency unprovided for.

The war was also a conflict between liberty and absolute despotism. The appearance of American warships in the Bay of Yedo in 1853, under Commodore Perry, to break the nation's hermitage and compel a treaty of commerce, awoke Japan from the sleep of centuries. The black ships, in frightening the life out of Japan, frightened life into her by driving the people together into oneness of purpose. For the first time in two thousand five hundred years the people, high and low, were requested to make suggestions as to the best method of defending the nation. In 1868 the present Emperor took the throne, and immediately began to give away his power in granting a National Assembly, then a Senate, then a Court of Appeals. In 1890 he completed his work of giving liberty to the people by promulgating a Constitution. And thus the fog of the Island Empire lifted, and "the dark night of Asia gave way before the light of the Rising Sun." During the reign of the present Mikado a despotism as absolute as that of Russia has been turned, without a drop of blood, into a monarchy so limited as to be a real democracy, and the quiet, modest nation asleep upon the bosom of the Pacific has arisen to become the Queen of the East, and one of the dominant empires of the world.

Japanese Loyalty

The present Mikado is the one hundred and twenty-second sovereign of a dynasty that has ruled the nation without a break for 2,400 years. The people claim that the original mother of the Mikado is the Sun-goddess, and that he has divine attributes. His singularly wise and beneficent administration has intensified their reverence almost into idolatry. Love for the Emperor, for the government which is so much their own, the consciousness of a vigorous manhood, have lifted the Japanese people up to a sublime pitch of loyalty, which at times in the soldiers seems like fanaticism. The contempt for death in the Japanese soldier, is not because he expects future reward for martyrdom, for he does not believe in the Moslem's heaven, and Buddhism has no favor for the one who sheds blood. It is the sense of duty to sovereign and to country which prompts him at the word of command to fling down his life with joy in battle. How could the oppressed and afflicted subjects of an absolute despotism like Russia, however many in numbers, or well drilled, or ably led, be expected to contend successfully with the intense loyalty and sublime heroism of the Japanese?

Russia is to be pitied. She is living in the principles of a time long past. Once the strong autocratic government was the world's ideal. To Russia it was a necessity. It would not have been possible to govern the savage, ignorant, and heterogeneous races under her flag other than by despotic methods. They were not fit for a liberal government. But times have changed. Her people have awakened to the consciousness of progress in other lands, and demand liberty and a constitution. The demand is so loud that her monarchy must be limited, either by peaceful reformation, like Japan; or by bloody revolution, as in France. If the Little Father shall continue to shoot down his children who cry for bread and liberty, or if, under the advice of unwise and wicked counsellors, he shall longer withhold representation by the people, the Empire will disintegrate. It was all that despotism could do to stand the silent influence of the democracy of the West, and now that it has received of the East, its throne is shaking, and it looks as if the only thing that will save the Czar or his throne, is the granting of liberty to the people. Let Russia learn from the little nation that has defeated her, the value of intelligence as compared with ignorance, and of liberty as compared with despotism. Let the Czar learn from the Mikado that no nation is so strong as the one in which the people have a voice, and that no sovereign has such power with his subjects as the one who gracefully yields to them his power.

As nearly a million of men stood with arms in their hands, facing each other, anxious for an opportunity to destroy one another, the Prince of Peace, who is taking the government of the world on his shoulder, put it into the heart of President Roosevelt to suggest a Conference in the hope of ending the war. No President had ever done such a thing before; no such Peace Conferer had ever been held on our shores. But the fact of being an innovation did not deter the President fr the attempt. To the surprise of the whole world, t two warring nations accepted the suggestion, realizi that it had been made in sincere good-will to th both. The United States have reason to be proud th while emperors and kings stood aloof, desiring pea yet shrinking from the delicate task of interfering in t quarrel, our own President, with exquisite delicacy a tact, took the role of peacemaker and brought t enemies into amicable communication. It is not t much to say that it was an achievement possible to other man in the whole world. It was a tribute to sagacity and discretion, that the Conference was held our land and was brought to a successful conclusion.

Our President's Achievement

The Conference, when it met, would likely have be a failure had it not been for the wise and earne counsel and direction of the President himself. H distinguished service has received the recognition ar congratulations of the rulers of most of the nations the earth, and, better still, the applause of the commo people, which rings around the world.

Our American civilization came to full bloom in t achievement of Theodore Roosevelt. His service to t cause of Christianity and of peace has laid the whol world under obligation, and has raised our nation in th esteem of kings, statesmen and people of every land.

The Peace of Portsmouth illustrates the principles the life and teaching of the Prince of Peace. He cam to bring peace on earth, good-will toward men. Th Conference has demonstrated that national quarrels, lik personal ones, can be settled by reason instead of b passion, by love instead of hate. The pen at Ports mouth saved at least 100,000 precious lives the swor was preparing to kill, and a million dollars a day t each side for expenses of the campaign. What poo economy it would have been to spend two million dol lars a day to send a hundred thousand soldiers to thei death who could produce such splendid values on th farm, in the store, office, shop, or place of employment What a crime it would have been to sell the lives of hundred thousand superb men for the other half of ar island, or millions of dollars as an indemnity! It is t be hoped that the Peace of Portsmouth will promote th cause of international arbitration and universal peace; that nations will appoint their Peace Commissioners and come to satisfactory agreements before, instead of after, a test of force.

Japanese Magnanimity

Japan might have been justly treated with greater liberality in the agreements of the Conference. Mr. Roosevelt hoped that she would be. But his efforts to secure it were thwarted by counsellors in St. Petersburg, who had influence with the Czar. Finding him immovable, he turned to the Mikado, and in that potentate he found magnanimity to a beaten foe worthy of a Christian statesman. Rather than continue the war and further humiliate his enemy, the Mikado waived the money payment to which he was justly entitled, and thus gained the admiration of the world. It showed the greatness of the Japanese character, which could be generous in victory as it had been valiant in conflict.

Not alone in waiving her claim to indemnity did Japan prove her magnanimity. The territory yielded by Russia had been wrested from Japan, and thus was a mere restoration of a robber's spoils. Port Arthur and the Liao-tung peninsula had been the possession of Japan, until Russia, backed by France and Germany in 1895, compelled Japan to surrender them to her. The island of Sakhalin also was Japanese, until in 1875 Russia seized it, compelling Japan to accept in exchange an island that was not Russia's to give. Russia simply restored, under the compulsion of arms, territory she had acquired by menaces and threats. But in the interests of peace, Japan accepted the concession, and would not drive her adversary to the wall. But Russia has learned a valuable lesson, and will never again treat Japan as a weak nation, incapable of protecting her rights.

It is not surprising that the Japanese people are dis-pointed and angry at the terms of peace. They have ffered so much in men and money, and have been so ctorious, that they had a right to expect more. The ber second thought will acquiesce in the terms, and n with energy and success to the arts of peace. The ts in Tokio and other cities are only spasms of anger, d are not the expression of hatred of foreigners or Christians that they are represented by her enemies.

But Japan's gains from the war, small as they are mpared with those which she might have insisted, are no means inconsiderable. She has destroyed Rus-'s sea power; she has driven her from Port Arthur, only ice-free port in the Orient; she has compelled ssia to give up her hold on Corea; she has driven from the peninsula and has made her release her p on the railroad; she has secured undisputed possesn of the best half of Sakhalin and the control of the sait that vessels must pass from Vladivostok to the cific, and she has put a stop to the division of China o "spheres of influence." Besides these material vantages, she has gained by her prowess in war, her elligence, and her high moral principles, a place for rself among the great nations, and has won the active endship and alliance of at least one great Power. The ace Conference has left all this untouched.

The Peace of Portsmouth will open new and wider orways in Japan and other countries of the Far East the march of our conquering Prince of Peace and the ssionaries of his cross. It would seem scarcely posble for Japan to adopt so many material expressions our Christian civilization without accepting somewat of the spirit and person of Christ. This she has ne. A native Japanese nobleman says, "I firmly believe we must have religion as the basis of our national and personal welfare. No matter how large an army or navy we may have, unless we have righteousness at the foundation of our national existence, we shall fall short of the largest success. And when I look about me to see what religion we may best rely upon, I am convinced that the religion of Christ is the one most full of strength and promise for the nation." Japan is accepting Christianity more rapidly than appears upon the surface. Her religion is a union of the best there is in Buddhism and Confucianism, containing the ethics of the one and the morals of the other. Christianity is becoming a strong element in the religion of the nation. During the empire's hermitage some Dutch Reformed missionaries managed to creep in and remain and put leaven in the meal, which has been working magically till the present time. The present Mikado in granting political liberty, gave also the largest religious liberty to his people. Able and consecrated missionaries of all denominations were admitted to his confidence and counsel.

In his earnest desire to bring Western learning and arts to his people, the Mikado sent large numbers of his most brilliant young men to the centres and colleges of Europe and America, where they remained four or five years seeing all they could, learning all they could, and bringing back to their native land the results of their investigations. Some of them were converts to Christianity when they went on their pilgrimage; others accepted the Prince of Peace while away, and most of them came back to their native land to proclaim, by public profession and by a godly life, that Christ is the Saviour of the individual and of the nation. Eternity alone can calculate the influence of the missionaries upon the throne, or of these young converts upon the religious destiny of the Empire. Most of the great leaders in the war just closed are Christian men. Oyama is a half brother of the Church. His wife is a devout Christian, and he has the profoundest respect for her religion. Generals Nogi and Kuroki the right and left arm with which he crushed the armies of the enemy, are both elders in the Presbyterian Church. Admiral Togo, who destroyed Russia's fleets, is a Christian. Generals, admirals, diplomatists, legislators, judges, distinguished men in all callings, and many of the common people, are proud to count themselves subjects of the Prince of Peace.

Thus I see in the Peace of Portsmouth and in the new era opened to Japan, a step gained in the march of conquest of the Prince of Peace. It was His victory that was achieved in that New Hampshire town. A victory for His principles and developed in His spirit. May His kingdom come and may His empire extend the world over. In every land may His rule be acknowledged, and among ourselves may it exert its power more and more mightily over us all, producing righteousness peace and power.

In the evolution of life, in the progress of society, in the experience of the individual heart, peace comes after conflict. If we be loyal to this Prince, if we yield our hearts to his sceptre of love, after the storm and battle of life he will receive us into his heavenly realm where we will have sunshine without a cloud, day without a night, flowers without a blight, melody without a discord, joy without sorrow, service without weariness, love without alloy, holiness without a stain.

Since 1882, many thousands of girls and boys have en sent out in organized parties to Canada, and a lge number of young emigrants to Australia and uth Africa, from the Barnardo Homes. Many of te children who have been reared in these refuges are w grown men and women, earning an honorable elihood for themselves in different parts of the world. ver ninety-eight per cent. of all who have been train- in the Barnardo Homes and afterwards started in life nder their auspices, are doing well—some in Canadian mesteads, others on Australian ranches, and still hers on their native soil. A number of years ago r. Barnardo acquired about nine thousand acres of nd near Russsell, Manitoba, for the purpose of start- g an industrial farm. Buildings were erected and a mber of young lads sent out under the care of a perintendent. The farm now includes about fourten square miles of the most fertile prairie land in the ominion. Several hundred young graduates of the ome live on it; their conduct has been admirable, and ie general prosperity and prospects of the settlement 're all that could be desired.

Picked up literally in the gutters and the slums, ese little outcasts are trained to become godly men and women, skilled in useful trades, and self-respecting and honest. Able Christian men and women are in charge of the different institutions, and all are operated on the plan of a great family with numerous branches. At this moment over 7,000 orphans alone are being sheltered and trained in the Homes. Dr. Barnardo's agents are searching night and day for the little homeless and neglected waifs, and no one who comes under that category is ever refused admission. No girt, patronage, or influence is needed to secure an entrance to the Homes. The industrial, educational, and religious training is thoroughly systematized, and the best results are attained. It is estimated that the annual cost per child for support, shelter, clothing, and all the necessaries, is $80. Thousands have already been sent to farm homes in Canada, many to Australia, and other tens of thousands are leading lives of honorable industry in the United Kingdom.

Those who knew Dr. Barnardo intimately were never surprised at the love the children bore him. Even amid all his trials and cares, he would turn to some group of his little charges, and, with a few kind words, would instantly bring them tumbling upon him in a heap. He was their playmate, their friend, their consoler, their adviser, in all sorts of juvenile troubles, and he won their love without an effort. His religion was of the cheerful, optimistic kind. He believed in God's promises, and trusted him for everything. He used to say, with a smile: "Never once have I been disappointed." All his troubles he took to the Father above, whether they related to supplies for his various Homes, money for repairs, or for any other purpose. His faith was boundless, and even in the darkest hours he felt assured that the Lord would not permit his work to suffer for the lack of friends and supporters. When the work had grown to immense proportions, and it seemed as though it would be impossible to supply all its needs, contributions poured in upon him from almost every land under the sun, from those who had been touched by the simple story of the unselfish surgeon who was trying to lift up the waifs, and to clean up the worst of England's slums. After 1889, the annual income from all sources averaged over $500,000. Four years later, it rose to

ONE OF THE LARGE BAKERIES

A LESSON IN TINSMITHING

$750,000; and, in 1902, it reached the princely sum of $893,660. The donors and helpers at the present time number about 100,000, of whom 26,000 are enrolled as "The Young Helpers' League."

It was Dr. Barnardo's special care, long before the close of his active life, so to arrange matters that the various institutions which he had founded, and which were incorporated under the title of "The National Incorporated Association for the Reclamation of Destitute Waif Children, otherwise known as Dr. Barnardo's Homes," should, as far as possible, be placed upon a permanent basis, and be made independent of the tenure of a single life. In this he succeeded so well, that there is little doubt that the Homes which he so lovingly founded and conducted will go on, and that many more thousands of waifs and orphans will be added to the great army who have already been rescued. Thus, under divine blessing, the grand work of this noble man will be perpetuated through the coming years.

It is difficult to realize that, forty years ago, there was not even a beginning made in this work. Before that time how many children must have been left to perish or to add to the criminal classes! The number of children now in the Homes, and those who have passed through, give us a basis for reckoning how many must have been in need before the Institutions were founded. That one man should have been able to accomplish so much in the span of his life, shows what may be done by individual effort when the worker is in earnest, unselfish, and consecrated to Christ's service.

A Heathen King at Home

SOME OF THE KING'S WIVES

OUR CARAVAN READY TO START

NATIVES LISTEN TO THE GOSPEL

The Story of a Missionary Visit to a Native African Monarch in the "Lion Country"

HOW difficult it is to make friends in the homeland understand what a missionary trip involves. Though we may be gone only a week or two, we need a whole caravan of native boys to carry what is necessary to be taken.

The purpose of our latest journey, concerning which I now write, was to make final arrangements with the native king, M'Ronki, for Mr. Greeley to settle at his kraal as his missionary. We asked Mr. and Mrs. Ferris to join us in the expedition, and on Monday, the third of July, we started—a party of five white people and twenty-nine natives. The two ladies each had a machela (a kind of hammock), to travel in, with six bearers each, who carried them two at a time. This is very hard work, and the bearers have to change frequently. There were two donkeys, which the three white men rode in turn. The carriers bore on their heads our tents, boxes of food, blankets and cooking utensils. We always travel single file along the narrow native paths, and our cavalcade must have extended to the length of two ordinary city blocks.

We camped the first night at a kraal ten miles from Umtali. Our tents were pitched and we were glad, after having evening prayer with the boys, to retire, as we were all fatigued, each having worked hard to get ready to start. We made an early start the next morning, unfortunately without our breakfast, so that we did not get anything to eat till 2 P.M., as we could not before that hour reach a place where there was water. After dinner and a rest in the heat of the day, we again traveled on till we reached the Odzi river. The white men swam across, but Mrs. Ferris and I had to be carried on the shoulders of two natives—not a very enjoyable position.

We camped on the banks of the Odzi that night. It was the Fourth of July, and we sat round our camp-fire and sang, "My Country, 'tis of Thee." Mrs. Ferris amused us that morning by appearing with a small American flag pinned on her dress. She had remembered, before leaving home, that we should spend the Fourth on the journey, so she thought she would give us a pleasant little surprise.

We were now in the "lion country," and huge bonfires were kept burning all night around our camp. The gentlemen lay in their tent, with guns close at hand; but we slept safely "under the shadow of His wings," making an early start the next morning. We hoped to reach M'Ronki's kraal before night; but our boys lost the way, and we found darkness coming on, so we were compelled to pitch our tents another night in the open.

We were now in the country where lions abound, and the natives were much afraid. They pulled down branches of the trees, and put them round in a circle, making a nice, secure place for the donkeys, and then lighted a number of bonfires all around the encampment, which were kept up all night. We had a huge bonfire just in front of our tent.

That night we gathered all the natives around our fire for our usual evening service, and read the 91st Psalm. Such a pillow to go to rest upon! I shall not soon forget that night. As we looked up at the starry sky, we saw the Southern Cross shining down upon us in all its brilliancy. O, how Africa needs the light of the Cross of Jesus Christ to shine upon her! We looked at the swarthy faces around the fire. Just a few knew the power of the Cross, and these joined in lifting their voices in prayer; but most of them were still in darkness. How we longed that the words that were spoken and the hymns that were sung, might awaken a desire in the hearts of these heathen boys to know Jesus. At the close of the service, we went to rest as peacefully as in our beds at home.

Two hours traveling the next morning brought us to M'Ronki's kraal. It is a wonderful place, like an immense fortress on the top of a mountain. We had to leave our machelas and climb from rock to rock. Looking up, it seemed impossible to go farther, as there appeared nothing but perpendicular walls of rock rising many feet above us; but we finally reached the top, and what a sight met our view! We could look down on a vast extent of country, with forests and mountains all below us. Range upon range, far as the eye could reach. Then, turning round, we saw piles of gray rock still above us. One huge pile reminded me of Dover

KING M'RONKI AND HIS FAVORITE WIFE

Castle. It is just under this pile that King M'Ronki has his kraal.

Mr. Wodehouse sent word to the king of our arrival, and in the afternoon he went up to have a talk with him. It was arranged that we should hold a service at his kraal the following morning. This service was held on the top of a large, flat rock. When we reached the place, the king was already sitting in the centre, surrounded by his Indunas. He did not rise, but we each shook hands with him "native fashion," taking the hand as we do, and then the thumb. There were no women to be seen at first; they were afraid, as many had never seen a white woman. It was the first time a white woman had ever been to the kraal.

Mr. Wodehouse asked the king if he would send for his wife, as he wanted to take his picture with his wife. He has ten wives, but I think it was the youngest he sent for. She evidently appeared to be his favorite. He seemed quite proud to have his picture taken.

After the service, we invited him to come down to our camp, and presently he came down with his Indunas, and they all sat round our camp fire. Mr. Wodeho e made him a present of a blanket, which one of his i- dunas took for him. I suppose it was beneath his g- nity to touch it himself or to express any pleasure. e looked quite indifferent, not in any way acknowledg g the gift. We had our boys hand round coffee and - cuits. The king would not eat or drink, but hande t to his Indunas. We learned afterwards that he s afraid that the white man's food might influence him n his decision, which he was to make at this time wh regard to the site for our Mission station. After a lo indaba, he consented to allow Mr. Greeley to have s house on the site of our encampment.

On Sunday morning we all went to M'Ronki's kr l for service. Mr. Greeley spoke, illustrating his - marks from the Sunday School scroll. Only a few f M'Ronki's people were present. We learned afterwa l that most of the people had gone to the fields to wo , They know no Sabbath. Brother Greeley tried to t : to the piccaninnies after the service, but they were frightened that most of them ran away as fast as th could in different directions.

While we were sitting at dinner, the king came w his retinue and two of his wives, with a goat, which presented through his favorite wife, to the two inko kazi (the two white ladies). After dinner, about c hundred gathered; there were at least forty women well as children. Some of the women had thick piec of white china inserted through the upper lip, whi gave them a very singular appearance. Mr. Greel again gave the Gospel message. The king was ve excited, as he had been drinking Kafir beer; but ma seemed interested, especially the children.

We left for home the following Wednesday after most enjoyable time, and feeling glad that soon the wild, ignorant people would have a missionary livi among them and hear the Gospel message, and that t dear little children will be taught the way to God. O looks forward to the transformation in the near futu when that now heathen kraal shall resound with Chri tian song, and those grand rocks reverberate and ecl back praises to Jesus.

Dear friends, add M'Ronki's kraal to your interce sions at the throne of heavenly grace.

THREE LITTLE WANDERERS IN THE WAGON

MATRON TRAVERS(D) AND SOME OF HER LOST CHILDREN

THE LOST CHILDREN'S "SKY PARLOR"

HOW STRAY AND RUNAWAY BOYS AND GIRLS ARE CARED FOR IN NEW YORK

WHAT becomes of all the lost children in the metropolis?" is a question which often suggests itself to the thoughtful mind. Hundreds these little ones go astray in the streets of the great ty every month, and the constant watch of the police r these wanderers is a humane work and frequently a thetic one.

Once upon a time a child lost in Manhattan was ined a serious matter; but nowadays it is certain to tract attention almost immediately. Its lusty lungs d babbling words bring kind-hearted strangers to its scue, and then the trouble is lisped in baby fashion to e policeman. He takes it under his protecting wing the station in his precinct, where it is kept until ven o'clock at night, and, if still unclaimed, it is then nt to headquarters at 300 Mulberry Street. Not a ay passes that does not bring from ten to fifteen of ese baby vagrants to the central station—the great rsery for rich and poor—the clearing-house for lost ildren of all nationalities. At headquarters, a serant takes charge of the child and ters its name (if it remembers it), on the big blotter, where thousands its unfortunate kind have already en registered. Not more than one ild in a hundred is missing over venty-four hours. This is due to the most perfect system which has been ganized to meet the city's need.

The anxious parents visit the police ation, and a general alarm is sent out er the wires to all of the stations in ew York, giving a description of the issing one. This is read to the policeen before they begin their early tour f duty. The general alarm costs the ty over ten dollars for every child in hose behalf this summons is sent out. a brightly lighted office on the first oor, a sergeant sits in full uniform, aiting patiently for his tearful little uests. He questions them, and writes eir answers in a big book—the name, ge, sex, by whom found, when and here. These all become a matter of istory. The color of the registration k determines to the practical eye, the ound child's nativity. If the child is negro, the entries are made in red k; if Chinese, he is recorded in ellow ink, and there are but few of ese entries, for the Mongolian parents are careful uardians.

The sergeant in charge of the Bureau receives a salary f $2,000 per year. As it takes him thirty minutes to repare a description of the missing one, this costs the ity twenty-eight cents. Telegraphing to each of the hirty-five stations costs $3.50. The services of the ergeants at the other end of the line cost $5.40. It equires probably fifteen minutes for the officer who inds the child to take it to the station-house, and the ame length of time to go back to his post—a cost of eventeen cents. The house duty man who brings it to eadquarters requires as an average, two hours, sixty-ix cents. Now Matron Travers takes charge of the waif, for which she gets twenty-five cents and a salary besides. Deducting the time for sending a general alarm, it costs one dollar and sixteen cents for every child brought to the "sky-parlor" at police headquarters. In one year there were 3,050 children lost in the great metropolis, and it cost the city just $3,538 to return them to their parents.

This "sky-parlor" is Matron Travers' own domain. It was on a typical Saturday evening in the station when I found her. She has been foster-mother to thousands of children during her sixteen years' service in the "sky-parlor." While this room is by no means an ideal reception room for lost children, it is kept neat and clean. The rough plastered walls have a dingy bareness. The threadbare carpet speaks of decent and respectable wear; but the desolate appearance of the room, which is lighted by gas at night and gloomed by sky-light by day, makes it the last room in the world in which to receive frightened and heart-broken children. In fearful juxtaposition to this is the room for measuring criminals according to the Bertillion system.

HAPPY PARENTS RECLAIM THEIR LITTLE ONES

There is a strong iron fence between; but all criminals must pass the play-room for lost children, the room which records their infallible identity.

Lucky is the little tot who falls into Matron Travers' kind, motherly hands. Day and night she is in readiness for company. Her meals and her slumbers are alike disturbed by the unexpected guests. The children usually come to her a disreputable looking lot. No child who has played all day in the gutter is attractive when he reaches headquarters, and he invariably comes in tears.

There was one boy in the "sky-parlor" when I arrived. It was not yet seven o'clock. He was asleep in a cradle beneath a fierce light that beat upon his face from overhead. Matron Travers had washed his face bright and clean for his parents' inspection and he held a small cake clutched in his tired hand. The door opened suddenly and a man came in.

"Yes, that's my Tony," he exclaimed as he picked up the sleeping child and started for the door, here he stopped and exclaimed, "No, that ain't Tony; he ain't got no checked shirt like that," and with this he put him back in his little bed.

The matron smiled as he turned away, and said, "It's small wonder that some children stray away, when you stop to consider what kind of parents they have."

I had heard another story below, while the sergeant was holding inquisition over a small, sleepy head that waggled "No" in answer to the question, "Don't you know where you live?" It was this: that Matron Travers is such a good hostess, that many girls and boys acquire the habit of getting lost just to come down to visit her, where they get washed and fed, and also see the pretty pictures she always has on hand. "Yes," said the matron, "I have had several who made a habit of getting lost. One of the most hopeless cases was a little colored boy about seven years' old. He used to get lost at least once a week, and after staying overnight would remember in the morning where he lived. His visits became so frequent that he was at last put in the custody of the Children's Society. Summer-time is the worst season for lost children. More of them play in the streets at this time. The greatest numbers are found on national holidays, and after political celebrations. On Decoration day there were 87 children entered on the blotter as lost.

"The people living on the East Side are sharp and wide awake. They soon discovered that their children were well fed and amused when picked up by the policemen, and, in addition to cake and goodies, they were often given pennies to quiet them; so they hit upon the scheme of having the city keep their children when they wanted a day's outing. They would get a relative or friend to take the children around to the station and enter them as lost children. When this scheme was discovered, the practice was broken up. Occasionally we get children from the well-to-do class; but their parents and nurses are always waiting for them when they are brought in, and we have never yet kept one overnight.

"We keep the children here two days, and then send them to the Gerry Society, if unclaimed. I always have more trouble with one or two than with a whole roomful, from the fact that they amuse themselves by playing with each other."

Here Matron Travers was interrupted by a new arrival—not a child, but a mother. Recognizing her offspring through the latticed fence, the mother began: "Did any one give you pennies when you cried? What did you do with them? Did the bad policeman pinch you? Tell mother all about it."

"That," added the matron, "is why some children get lost."

Obstacles to Seeking God

SEVERAL letters have been sent to this office asking for more light on an answer recently given in "Our Mail-Bag" to an inquirer. The question was whether the familiar injunction of Isaiah to "seek the Lord while he may be found," implied that otherwise the Lord might withdraw where he could not be found. Our answer was that a more probable contingency was that the seeker who postpones his search, might become incapable of finding him. Some of our critics contend, that if a man is incapable of finding God he is not responsible, and that there can never come in any man's life, a time when the way to God cannot be found, unless the man becomes demented and so cannot be held accountable.

There are, unhappily, many men who are not demented, who are incapable of really seeking God, who, nevertheless, are responsible for their condition. The fact that the proportion of people who are converted late in life is so small, proves that contention. When a man devotes his life wholly to worldly concerns; when he leaves God out of his thoughts; when he habitually thinks and acts on selfish principles, and does this for a long course of years, he often finds himself incapable of seeking God. His disposition, his habits, and motives, are alien to God, and, it is difficult, if not impossible, to reverse them. The principles of his life have so long been fixed, that he cannot get into the right attitude in which a successful search is possible. His mind is running on his business, or his pleasures, and religion is distasteful to him. It is the result of the life he has lived, and he is responsible for that. Many young people think that when they have made a fortune, or when they have become settled in life, they will have more leisure to attend to the affairs of the soul; but it is generally a delusive hope, as the statistics of church membership prove. The great bulk of the people who are living Christian lives, loving and serving God, were converted in their youth.

This does not imply that God is unwilling to receive them if they do come to him. None that come in sincerity are cast out. The promises of mercy are good till the last. God is longsuffering and full of compassion, even to those who, through a long life, have neglected him. The difficulty is in the men themselves. They are not in touch with divine things. They are under the impetus of the habits of thought and action which have controlled them in the past, and they find it hard to stop and turn to God. True, there are some who do—a sufficient number to give hope, even to the aged. But how difficult it is! The injunction of the prophet casts no reflection on God's mercy; but it is based on a law of our own nature. Therefore, he was wise when he said: "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found."

A Mormon Explanation

PRESIDENT JOSEPH F. SMITH, the head of the Mormon Church, has found it necessary to assume the task of publicly defending the hierarchy from the attacks that are now being made upon it from many sides. It would seem that the chief hierarch shares the alarm bordering on panic which the Mormon leaders feel, in view of the great national movement among the women for the suppression of polygamy and the removal of the Mormon Apostle from the United States Senate.

Ignoring the stubborn fact that the continued existence of polygamy was proved by the Senate investigation, and that polygamy is the main issue in the present controversy, the chief hierarch addresses himself to vindicating the Church from the charge of commercialism. This attempt, however, he quickly abandons as futile, for, after berating his critics and telling them the accusations are "false and foolish stories," he says, "I shall not deny that Mormonism has a material or commercial side," and further admits, with amusing candor, that it has had such a side from the very beginning. One does not need to read between the lines to become convinced that it has been a paying speculation.

But there is a sad rift in the lute, so to speak, for just at the point when one very naturally expects the chief hierarch to enter upon the defense of the charge of continued polygamy, he utters strange discords, in which such unapostolic words as "trash," "fabrications," "malice," "hypocrisy, and "lies" can be distinguished. He has forgotten, and he seems to think that the people of Utah have also forgotten, the principal incidents of the Senate investigation. Yet there is not a single point of the present popular movement which has not that record as its basis; not a charge that is uncorroborated by the testimony then adduced. Besides dealing with the whole subject of Mormon revenues, local and state, political methods, control of conventions and elections and dictation of nominations, that investigation wrung from the lips of unwilling witnesses admissions relative to the continued existence of polygamy which the whole nation remembers. These admissions cannot now be set aside or ignored. Yet, when he comes up to this vital point of the controversy, the chief hierarch nimbly dodges around the fence and fills the air with stereotyped lamentations, alleging persecution and misrepresentation.

It is useless for the Mormon President to waste time befogging the real issue, which is polygamy. Mormon creed and Mormon tribute are matters which, however offensive they may be, no one who recognizes the constitutional right of Americans to freedom of worship will desire to question. But when the case is one of actual and admitted disobedience of "the laws of God and man," the offenders, whether hierarchs or apostles, must be made amenable to the law, even though its enforcement should involve sweeping the whole Mormon dynasty out of existence.

A Noble Career Ended

IF we were not sure that a wise and loving Father orders all the events of this world, we should regard the sudden closing of the life of so useful a man as Dr. T. J. Barnardo, as a mistake. God knows the times and the seasons and decides when the faithful servant shall be called to his rest. The world can only submit to its loss, thanking God "that such have been, although they are no more." Almost boundless is the service that Dr. Barnardo rendered to humanity; but much remains to be done and we can but hope that some other spirit, as devoted, may be found to carry on his work.

It is now nearly forty years since the impecunious medical student in London found a poor street waif named Jim Jarvis, shivering, shoeless and ragged, in a doorway, and undertook to find a shelter for him. It was a kindly act, and it led to the protection of others, and finally to his giving his life to the work. It grew under his hands and prospered. Boys were taken from the streets, cared for, fed, clothed and educated and started in life, some at home and large numbers in Canada. The last annual report Dr. Barnardo issued, early this year, showed that over sixty thousand of these waifs had received a start in life through his instrumentality. The value of his work came into public recognition and the means of extending it was supplied. The first contribution he received came from a poor servant-girl who knew of the help he had given to one of her relatives. She begged him to accept all her savings, which amounted to thirteen cents. It was a small beginning, but the work was good and God blessed it. The last acknowledgment Dr. Barnardo made, showed a total revenue of over ten million dollars. It was all economically and wisely expended. Over seven thousand children were in the Homes he had built, and were depending on him for support when he passed away.

His long career of service is now closed. One wonders what must have been his estimate of it at the end. He might have devoted it to money-making, and we may be sure that the administrative ability he possessed would have secured a fortune. Or he might have entered politics and have won a place for himself among the foremost men of his time. He chose to give his life to the poor and to them who had no helper. He made himself a friend of the friendless and a refuge for them who were ready to perish. At the close of his life, as he thought of those sixty thousand waifs, who had become self-supporting citizens, instead of jail-birds, through his efforts, he must have felt that it was a better thing that he had done, than if he had labored for himself. The blessing of the fatherless had come upon him, and a welcome awaited him from the Master he had so faithfully served.

Scandinavia's Crisis

THREATS of war between Norway and Sweden have been current during the past two weeks. In spite of the fact that commissioners have been holding meetings at Karlstadt to arrange nicable terms of separation, complaints of bad faith e made by both sides. The opinion prevails through- t Sweden that Norway intends war and is preparing r it. Rumors are spread that artillery and military ores are being brought to the frontier, and that the orwegian army is being placed on a war footing. On e face of the trouble there appears no reason for a nflict. The points in dispute are kept secret, but they e believed to relate to the fortresses which Sweden quires Norway to demolish. On the one hand, orway contends that the fortresses are necessarily fensive, and that if Sweden does not intend to attack r, she has no ground for objection to the fortresses. n the other hand, Sweden asks what use Norway can ve for the fortresses, unless it contemplates a war with veden. A suggestion, believed to have originated th King Edward, of England, has been made, that e fortresses be dismantled, not demolished. It is ped that Sweden will accept that compromise, which rway would probably agree to. It is very certain at the European Powers will exert all their influence prevent an open rupture. The fear that Russia, rmany, and perhaps England, might be drawn into e conflict, renders all anxious that peace should be intained.

The question of the future government of Norway es not come before the commissioners at Karlstadt. is, however, well understood that it will not be a public. The strong tendency of the Norwegian ople is in favor of a monarchy. When the separa- n from Sweden is an accomplished fact, the Norwe- an people will proceed to consider the question of a nstitution and a monarchy, and it is believed that the own will be offered to a member of the royal family Denmark. It becomes clearer as the negotiations oceed, that both countries will be better for the sepa- tion. The union had produced so many sources of itation, that their continuing under one government ld become hopeless. Perhaps in their separation ey will be better friends than they have been, united, d the causes of friction ll be diminished. As the case of the ancient ingdoms of whom the ophet wrote:

The envy also of Ephraim shall depart: Ephraim shall not vex Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim (Isa. 11: 13).

World's Largest Steamer

An assembly of distinguished persons, including the Emperor and Empress of Germany, witnessed on August 29 the launching of a new steamship, which is the largest now afloat. It belongs to the Hamburg American line, and has been built in the Vulcan shipyards at Stettin. It has been named the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria, and the Empress herself performed the ceremony of naming her by breaking a bottle of champagne on the ship's bow. The Emperor showed his appreciation of the enterprise of the company by conferring on Herr Ballin, the managing director of the line, the diamond star of the Crown Order. The vessel is of 25,000 tons register, is 700 feet long, 77 feet beam and 54 feet deep. It has 35,200 horse-power and will have a speed of eighteen miles an hour. It is estimated that it will have a capacity for four thousand persons. The company is having a twin vessel of the same dimensions constructed in England. It is an evidence of the increase of trans-Atlantic travel that such vessels should be needed for the convenience of travelers. The time, characterized by travel and investigation, has certainly come which the prophet foresaw centuries ago in his vision:

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased (Daniel 12: 4).

Operating on the Heart

A critical surgical operation was performed a few days ago in the Germantown Hospital, Philadelphia. A man was brought in who had been shot in the breast. The wound was in a line with the heart, and the surgeons believed that the organ had been grazed, if it had not been pierced. The patient was in a very low condition, and his death was momentarily expected. As it was evident that death must ensue if heroic measures were not taken, and that therefore there was nothing to be lost by an operation, the surgeons determined to examine the heart. An incision was made, portions of two ribs removed, and the heart was exposed. The operating surgeon took it in his hand while search was made in the cavity for the bullet. It was found imbedded within a fraction of an inch of the heart, and its pressure had interfered with its pulsations. When the bullet was removed, the heart, which had continued beating while the surgeon held it, was restored to its place. The wound was closed and the patient is in a fair way to recovery. In former times such an injury would have inevitably caused death; but now, science has so far advanced, that it can deal even with so critical a case. There its power ends. The far more common difficulty of a corrupt heart it is powerless to cure. For that the sufferer must go to Him who alone can deal with it.

I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh (Ezek. 11: 19).

FORTRESS OF THE FREDRICKSHALD, NORWAY

IDE FJORD, FROM THE OLD FORTRESS, FREDRIKSSTEN

Lost in New York

Among the crowds waiting in the South Ferry house in New York on a recent evening, were three colored children, the eldest of them twelve years old. They did not go out to the boat with the other passengers, but camped on a seat in a dark corner and went to sleep. The attendants noticed them, but concluded they were waiting for their mother. But two hours later they were still there and then they were awakened. The eldest girl explained that she and her two sisters had come from Virginia, where they had been living with their grandmother. Their father worked in New York and they had come to live with him. He had sent money to pay their fare. They had supposed there would be no difficulty in finding him; but they had wandered about the city all day and had not seen him. They were tired out and had gone into the ferry house to rest and sleep. The police took them to the Children's Society, where they will be cared for till their father claims them. It is pathetic to think of the little ones seeking through the big city for their father through all those long hours. It is well that in seeking for our Heavenly Father there is no need for anyone to wander aimlessly.

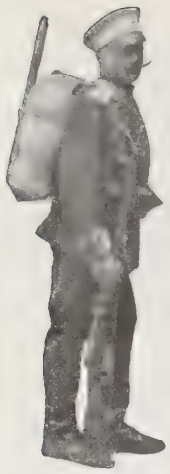
If thou seek him he will be found of thee (I. Chron. 28: 9).

The United States Insulted

There is strong indignation in Cuba, as well as in this country, over an insult to our escutcheon, which was committed on September 20, at Cienfuegos. Over the American Consulate in that city there is the coat of arms of the United States. During the preceding evening, some unknown persons collected filth from the roadway, and flung it on the emblem. The motive for the dastardly act is not clear. Each of the political parties accuses its rival of the outrage. The general opinion is that it was done not out of hatred to the United States, but with the hope that it would embarrass the government, and lead to complications which would bring about its fall. Happily for Cuba, our government has too much good sense to resent an insult, that in some relations might involve war. An apology will probably be required, and will doubtless be freely tendered, and there the matter will end. It is, however, strange, that in the land for which the United States has done so much, its emblem should be bespattered. But service does not always insure gratitude. God had frequent occasion to reproach the people whom he had delivered, for their ingratitude to him and their infidelity, in the time of their peace and prosperity.

They forsook the Lord God of their fathers, who had delivered them out of the land of their enemies (Judges 2: 12).

Macedonia Ready to Rise



SOLDIER OF THE LINE

THE skies lighted by the fires of racial and religious prejudice in the Caucasus region, have diverted public attention from the fact that the Macedonian crater of unrest is still bubbling and ready to boil over at a moment's notice. Its contents, seething with the fierce heat engendered by continued acts of injustice, are already so near the edge, that a stream of armed men, under the leadership of Sarafoff himself, is trickling over into Turkey, to the consternation of the authorities. In times past, the Pashas have been made acquainted with Sarafoff's methods of compelling attention.

The Revolutionary element has not been idle during the past two years while waiting for the utter futility of the Austro-Russian reform schemes (that spelled fiasco from the beginning), to become patent to the great Powers of Europe, which are pledged by the Treaty of Berlin, of 1878, to secure the good government of the Turkish provinces.

Realizing that the issue was bound to come, and that Providence, even in the affairs of nations, helps those who help themselves, they, with the temporal assistance and moral support of their blood brothers in Bulgaria, have been arming, drilling, and planning for the time when a general outbreak should compel the interference of the Powers and gain Macedonian autonomy. The result would be the granting of a separate government for their country. The movement is a national one for Bulgaria, with the endorsement of Church and State.

Some of the methods employed by certain factions in the Macedonian committees have been repudiated by the more conservative as unworthy their support, and a great injury to their cause. This was true of the Stone capture, which was publicly denounced by Mihailovsky, the president of the Macedonian committee, in a speech at Varna, as "a black stain upon the record of the committee." Aside from Sarafoff, whose brilliant deeds of daring have made him the idol of the common people,the majority of the revolutionary leaders are conservative men of earnest conviction. Their profound religious sentiment and their deep patriotism, would lead them even to the martyr's stake.

While the Bulgarian Ex-arch in Constantinople is forced to exhort his people to prudence and moderation, it is a well known fact that he is in full sympathy with the Macedonian committees, even though his primary object is to detach as large a portion of the Slavonic element as possible from the control of the Greek church. In many cases, the Bulgarian priests are acting in the capacity of political spies, while the various monasteries are the headquarters of the insurgents. Here their arms are stored, their large bakeries and food depots are established, their sick cared for.

Other leaders of this stripe are Petroff, Strezoff, Nasteff and Nicholoff.

Sarafoff, the firebrand, whose achievements make one think of the old Homeric days and heroes, is also a patriot—there is no doubt about that—but one whose methods have partaken more or less of the brutality of the Turks and the lawlessness of the brigands, in accord with the familiar Turkish expression: Din-sis-in hakenddan-I mam sis-galir. "It takes an infidel to cope with a sceptic." This is not to be wondered at when his early experiences and education are taken into account. He is a Macedonian by birth, a native of the little Turkish village of Ljujechovo, but comes of Christian ancestry. When but a boy at the High School at Salonica, he saw his father and grandfather dragged into the city in chains, surrounded by a cordon of Turkish police, accused, with other Christians, of fomenting rebellion against Turkish control.

From that moment Sarafoff applied himself to his studies with the utmost diligence, preparing mentally for the task he had set himself of leading his people out of bondage. At the age of eighteen, he entered the Military Academy at Sofia, served as a common soldier in the ranks for a time, then passed his examinations with such credit that when he was twenty he received a commission as lieutenant of the First Bulgarian Infantry. Here he served for three years until the Macedonian question assumed definite shape, when he resigned to devote himself to the cause.

In 1895, at the head of a band of young men, he started to raid Turkish territory, and since that time has personally conducted over four hundred expeditions.

So great a menace to its power did the Turkish Government consider him, that a reward of 100,000 francs was set upon his head. Following the cessation of active hostilities three years ago, Sarafoff, thoroughly convinced of the futility of the promised reforms, devoted himself to a tour of foreign countries, hoping to arouse public interest in the cause of unhappy Macedonia, and solicit funds to help the rebellion.

He visited Paris, Rome and London, forming Macedonian revolutionary committees, and talked of coming to this country, but was deterred by hearing that he was suspected of being a party to the Stone capture, and therefore, persona non grata. Instead, other representatives of the Macedonian Committee were dispatched here, those more in accord with the Mihailovsky policy. Among those now in the country is Dr.George N. Chakaloff, a surgeon in the Bulgarian army. He is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, a fluent and eloquent speaker, and on fire to do his part toward liberating his people from an existence which is a blot on the scutcheon of civilization. While the Rev. Marco N. P. Popoff, pastor of the Evangelical Church in Sofia, who became known to many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through his efficient and faithful work in the distribution of aid to the thousands o unfortunate refugees from the Turkish massacres o three years ago, is not allied with any of the revolu tionary committees, he is, like all Bulgarians, in deepes sympathy with the cause.

A VOLUNTEER

The rank and file of the insurgents, who now numbe 20,000 men, are sturdy fellows and earnest patriots They are well supplied with arms and ammunition Although all Christians in Macedonia have been for bidden to carry arms, they know very well how to use them. At least a third of the regular army in free Bulgaria is made up of Macedonians eager to get the fine military training, even at the modest stipend o one dollar a month and "found." On their return to their homes, these white-capped Macedonian troops have been forced to leave their uniforms behind and resume their peasant garb; but the lessons they have learned in the latest methods of modern warfare are not forgotten, and are speedily put in practice. In every Bulgarian hamlet in Macedonia, after the hard day's work in the fields is ended, and the sleepy Turkish garrison retired to the guard-house, from which they have rooted objections to faring forth after dark, the peasants congregate in a field and a returned soldier proceeds to drill his neighbors according to the tactics he himself has been taught. Nor is it the men alone who "take up arms" against their "sea of trouble." "While Macedonians," says Dr. Chakaloff, "do not approve of women unsexing themselves as soldiers any more than Americans, it often happens that a schoolmistress, or a young peasant girl, comes to the leader of the band, and, with a look of determination such as only desperate women can assume, says, 'I have taken the oath; I am safer here than in the city with the Turk.' Then there is always a rifle and a cartridge-belt for her, and only a few days pass before she learns how to use them."

Nor are the women kept at home to care for their families, idle. Under cover of the friendly night, messengers bring the arms to the edge of the village, and there conceal them beneath the rocks or trees, marking the place with a secret sign. The next day, carrying their bundles of garments from their laundry, the nearest brook, they manage to get the arms, and concealing them beneath their burdens, convey them into the village and distribute them to the men. "LAYING IT UP IN HEAVEN"

BUCKSPORT CENTRE, MAINE.

Dear Christian Herald: No doubt you will be surprised to receive a letter from me, away down in Maine. I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a number of years, and have been deeply interested in the great work done for suffering humanity, especially among the little children who gather at Mont-Lawn every summer. We that live in the country and are surrounded by green fields and beautiful flowers, and have so much of the beauties of nature to enjoy, can hardly realize the suffering in our big cities, especially among the poor. When I read of the children I have often wished I could do something to help on the good work and be the means of shedding a little sunshine upon one life at least.

My husband died a year ago; he was seventy-six years old. When a boy of nineteen, he went to the Grand Banks fishing, the only time he ever went to sea as a sailor. From the money he earned, he saved a $20 gold piece, and when we were married a few years afterwards he gave it to me. I spent one-half, leaving $10. Some of my friends wanted me to make a pin of it; but I thought, after keeping it so many years, that I would rather lay it up in Heaven, for I believe that what we give in charity here,will be cashed at the bank of Heaven, and when we get there we will have the benefit of it.

I send the coin, and with it a prayer that it may prove a blessing to some poor little waif. A friend said to me that it would only be as a drop in the ocean, and thought it might be given where it would do more good; but I remembered that the ocean was composed of little drops, and if it were not for them, there would be no ocean. At the time of my husband's death, his pastor wrote of him, "He loved the church of which he was a member, and his best efforts were given to it. He was a man of strong character, whose life made a splendid record in its usefulness." I give the money in the name of my dear husband,

Asaph S. Lowell. M. W. L.

The money has been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and applied to the Children's Home Fund. It will be the means of giving three little ones a ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn, and will help on the vacation days of a fourth.

Such a gift seems doubly blessed, both in the giving and in the receiving. Given in memory of the husband of her youth, the gift has a greater than mere money value, as it comes from a kind, loving heart, ready to part with one of its most precious treasures, that one of His "little ones" might be benefited. Truly, a treasure laid up in Heaven.

TENT EVANGEL

TENT EVANGEL, at Fifty-seventh Street and Broadway, New York, continues to be a centre of Gospel activity. This tent was prominent in its early history by the association of the late D. L. Moody, who preached in it for two weeks. Three years ago the Rev. G. W. McPherson became the Superintendent. Rev. John J. Wicker has preached there for some time this season, and conversions were reported at every service. One evening one young man from Texas, one from England and another from Austria, representing Baptist, Episcopalian and Catholic parentage, were among the converts. Among those who have preached in the tent this season are Revs. J. Wilbur Chapman, Leu G. Broughton, C. I. Scofield, Geo. F. Pentecost, O. P. Gifford, John Robertson and J. Q. A. Henry, besides many prominent New York pastors. Drs. Marsh (of England) and Denny (of Scotland) have also spoken this year. Superintendent McPherson proposes to enlarge the scope of his work to other cities.

Our Household Circle

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Miss Eunice

THE last of the summer boarders, the ones who always lingered through September, had gone, but yet Miss Eunice Bridgeman gave no sign of leaving. She occupied a small room at th top of the house, and now that the merry schoolbys who had been her companions on that floor had pked their trunks and left, with regrets and goodbys, and promises to return another year, she was lely in her attic corner. All the inmates of the sond and third floors were gone, and the farmer's daghters had joyously taken possession of their own rms, rented through the boarding season. Mrs. Lquist began to wonder when Miss Eunice would give nice of her departure; one guest was not profitable, ar she wanted to settle down for the winter as soon as sh could. But Miss Eunice came down with the same cerful bird-like sprightliness to her three meals a day; wit trotting off for the same afternoon walk, and, wh the same gentle smile, handed out her boardmney every Monday morning.

'Why don't you tell her that w are not in the habit of keepin any one after the last of September," said Mabel Linqist to her mother.

'I really think you ought, m her dear," said Louise.

'Oh, girls, I don't like to," th mother replied. "The poor ly never has any letters, and sh may have nowhere to go. If sh is in any trouble, of course sh must stay here. We could nt turn out anybody in tuble."

'Of course not," both girls erly assented. That was the spit of the Linquist home.

'But, mother, why have you hl that suspicion?" inquired Cusin Tom, who half the time cled his aunt mother, as her on children did.

'Well, Tom, she has an anxics, worried look when she facies nobody's watching her, al she's poor, and proud, and dcouraged. I can tell, so I'll nt disturb her. If it gets to cold upstairs, she may take th sunny end room on the secol floor. The house is big ough to shelter one old lady."

'So is your heart," said Tom, jmping up and kissing his ant.

"Miss Eunice," remarked Ms. Linquist, on the next Mondy, "if you wish to stay until rd weather, you must let me cnge your quarters. Move down to the little room o the hall with Mabel and Louise. The price will be te same now the season's over."

Miss Eunice hesitated. "I know how good you are t let me stay, but I shall bother you only four weeks lger, Mrs. Linquist, then I shall have to go."

"Where shall you go?"

"I don't know. The last of my money will be spent ten, and I haven't any more coming. I thought, rybe, I could get some work for the winter somewere. If I can't get work, I shall starve."

It was a sorrowful story of loss and unkindness that Iss Eunice at last told her gentle hostess. She had dy one living relative, a brother, and he had not been en or heard of in his old home for many years. Miss Inice supposed that he was dead.

Mrs. Linquist took the thin hand in her's. "My ar," she said, "you will just live here, and be one of te family, and help me when you can, as a sister uld. You should have confided in me sooner. am sure you will be contented here, with those who ve you. So set your mind at ease. Here is your me as long as you may need one."

Miss Eunice remained, summers and winters, for five years. She became so efficient a helper that the Linquists paid for her services, and she grew younger with the years.

One day in the gloaming of an October afternoon, a stranger knocked at the farmhouse door.

"I am trying to find a lady named Eunice Bridgeman," he said.

Miss Eunice was called. The tall, sun-bronzed man looked at her steadily.

"Sister, it isn't possible you have forgotten little Phil?" be began, but he got no further.

"Oh, Philip," she cried, "I thought you were dead!"

"Not a bit of it, Eunice. But I've been long from home. Three months ago, home began to tug at my heat. I realized that I had done wrong, to stay away and make no sign. But I did not dream that father and mother were gone, nor that you were so poor. Can you forgive me, Eunice?"

Philip had not returned with a vast fortune, but he had brought back a competence. He took his sister to a home of their own in town, and he lavished gifts on the Linquists The bread cast on the waters had returned after many days. Every summer an elderly sister and brother repair to the Linquist farm, and take the two finest rooms for many golden weeks. Miss Eunice, in her rich satins and fine laces, is the same birdlike little woman who spent her time so cheerily under difficulties, in the attic corner in a summer of the past.

GOING TO SCHOOL IN THE SPREEWALD, GERMANY

Jolly fun these fellows have, on the way to school;
I would like it; wouldn't you? Could we pole along,
Merry as a song, skies all bright and blue,
Going cheerily to school, there to mind the master's rule.

A Woman's Trying Age

The most trying season of life for a woman is that which comes when, feeling young, she sees that others begin to regard her as old. In the later thirties, a woman in full vigor and ripened charm, may continue to feel like a girl, but the girls of eighteen not only, but of twenty-three and twenty-four, show by little unconscious tokens, that they look on her as their senior. Then, some morning, looking into her mirror, she sees with dismay a tiny reminder of time that no woman welcomes. Her hair, at the temples, is turning a wee bit gray. Precursor of the silver hair that is so lovely in the day of age, the first gray hair strikes a cold chill in the heart of youth. The season is one of trial.

But so long as a woman feels young, she need not worry over the tell-tale signs of increasing years. Every age has its advantages and forty should pay no tribute to twenty. At forty an unmarried woman is very independent. She may go where she will, travel or stay at home, and violate no accepted conventions. She may have friends among young and old. She is, if only she sees it aright, at the top of a golden hill, with rich prospects before as well as behind her.

The Bride's Linen

TO the new home the bride carries the household linen. It is her share in its furnishing. It includes a sufficient provision of table and bed linen, towels for every use, and, if practicable, quilts, blankets, and whatever in that line is usual and necessary.

Cotton sheets and pillow slips of excellent quality are by most people preferred to linen. Table cloths and napkins should be of good wearing linen, and makeshifts of any sort would better be avoided.

The number of sheets, pillow-cases, towels, and other articles essential to comfortable housewifery, cannot be arbitrarily determined. Have enough sheets to enable you to change your beds every week, and have a pair besides. The pillow slips are as two to one for every sheet. If economy must be studied closely, save on your trousseau, have fewer underclothing, fewer gowns and hats, and have an abundant provision of sheets and towels. A well equipped linen closet is a great comfort.

In using your sheets, draw from the bottom of the pile weekly. Never from the top. Do the same with towels and tablecloths. This will insure your supply from wearing out unequally. Be more than fastidious about the laundering of your household linen. It should be washed by itself and scrupulously bleached, as well as beautifully ironed. A careless laundress inflicts wounds on a housekeeper's heart, as well as ruins her dearest possession, her household linen.

The bells will presently be ringing merrily for the brides of our lovely autumn of this peerless year. And some of us will be wondering about wedding presents. Nothing is more acceptable than the gift of a very dainty and elegant luncheon or dinner cloth with its appropriate napkins. A group of friends combining may furnish a linen chest for a bride, adding to it centre-pieces, doylies, and spreads, if they wish.

The bridal linen should be marked with the maiden initials or the monogram of the bride.

Hemstitched sheets are very pretty, but they are less satisfactory than those simply turned over and hemmed, because they sooner require mending. The hem at the top of a sheet must be twice the breadth of the hem at the bottom.

Knitting as a Sedative

What a pity it is that every woman does not know how to knit. Innumerable charmingly feminine articles in soft wools and shimmering silks are produced by those who can use their steel or wooden needles with deftness and dexterity. Though Christmas is still a hope of the future, quite far off, provident women are making their Christmas presents now, and a white shawl for Aunt Sophy, a sweater for Miss Lucy, the little teacher your children love, a pair of socks for a baby's feet, of bedroom shoes for an aged lady, an afghan for a cradle or a crib, and many a useful thing besides, may be made at small cost, if one only know the art.

Because one may knit mechanically and not devote much conscious attention to it, letting the hands move, while the mind is thinking of something else, knitting is a sedative. It soothes rather than excites. In the days of old age, when the eyes may be dim, and infirmities creep slowly on, knitting is a resource and proves a helpful adjunct in fighting ennui and depression. Every woman child should learn it in the days when life goes gaily, that it may be an aid when gray hairs come and the grasshopper is a burden.

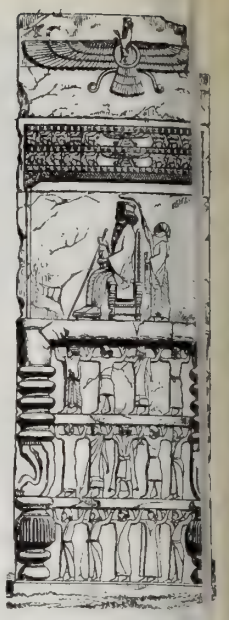
"Return, My Soul, Unto thy Rest"

Sunday School Lesson, By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*



BAS RELIEF OF KING CY

IF the city of Jerusalem had a voice, what stories it could tell of all that has occurred within its borders since the time of its beginning, four thousand years ago! It would say to us: "My eyes have seen strange sights, for people from almost every part of the world have done battle to possess me. My most glorious beauty was in the time of King Solomon," and then it would tell us of its sad story.

My people had been untrue to their God, and I knew that was why such great sorrows had come to them. And so I watched their return from exile with concern. I knew they had become a better people when I saw them at once proceed to build an altar and offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving to God. And then I heard them talking among themselves about beginning the building of the new temple, just as soon as they could get little houses made for themselves to live in. I never again saw them worship idol gods. And they kept the Sabbath more faithfully after this, remembering that it was chiefly because they had neglected to keep it, that God made them keep the seventy years of captivity (Neh. 13: 18). And drunkenness, which was another of the sins that made them captives at home, and then sent them into captivity abroad (Isa. 28: 1-7), was never again a characteristic of my Jewish people. The Babylon college of affliction had taught them these three great lessons, at a great cost, which they have not forgotten in the twenty-two centuries since.

Illustration and Application

For centuries the story of Israel has been used by prophets and poets as a picture of God's dealings with individuals as well as nations. What was done by Israel, was, in some cases, used as a type of what would be done by the Messiah, as in the prophecy, applicable to the Messianic nation and the Messianic person alike. "Out of Egypt have I called my Son" (Hos. 11: 1; Matt. 2: 15).

Almost every Christian who has a real experience, instinctively speaks of it in terms of Israel's history. He was brought out of Egyptian bondage to sin, and escaped through Calvary's Red Sea, which cut off the guilty fears that pursued him. Israel's longing to return to the flesh pots, even though slavery went with them, and the frequent backslidings of the wilderness, are sadly duplicated in most of our lives as we go so slowly toward the better land of a better life. Some of us know what it means to cross the Jordan and enter into victory and rest. Israel under Joshua, conquered and occupied only one-third of "the Land of Promise," which was fully possessed for the first time under Solomon, reminding us that in God's promises to us there is yet "much land to be possessed." But after the Solomonic glory of a heart temple filled with the joy of a consecrated life, there sometimes comes a falling away, from which only the discipline of an affliction like the captivity can restore us.

"Shall I show you my treasure?" a lame man said to a friend, and then he showed him his foot with a great wound in it. "How," asked his friend, astonished, "is that wound your treasure?" And then the sick man told him how, before his accident he had been idle and sinful, but that God had sent him the wound to check him in his evil courses, so that now he looked upon it as one of his best friends. So it may be with every difficulty, every trial which God sends us. If only we try to learn that God sent it to teach us something, then, like that young man's wound, it will prove our treasure.

The legend runs that there once stood in an old baronial hall, a musical instrument upon which nobody could play. It was complicated in its mechanism, and during years of disuse the dust gathered and clogged it, while dampness and variations of temperature had robbed the strings of their tone. Various experts had tried to repair it, but without success, and when the hand of a player swept over the chords, it woke only harsh sounds and discords. But there came one day to the castle a man who was the maker of the instrument, and saw what was amiss, and what was needed for its repair, and with loving care and skill he freed the wires from the encumbering dust, and adjusted those which were awry, and brought the jangling strings into tune, and then the hall rang with bursts of exquisite music. And so with these souls of ours, so disordered by sin; it is not until their Divine Maker comes and attempts the task of repair and readjustment, that they can be set right and made capable of the harmonies for which they were originally intended.

"God dealt with us as with sons" (Heb. 12: 7), seeking by loving chastenings to bring us back to faithfulness. When Israel sinned, God still spoke of them as "my people." To the apostles, who in his trial had forsaken Christ in faithless fear, the risen Christ bade Mary bear the message in substance, "Tell my brethren they are my brethren yet." The most perfect illustration of the return from captivity and of all such divine restorations is a long one, by S. D. Gordon, but worth the space it fills.

"One of the best pictures of God I ever saw came to me in a simple story. It was of a man, a minister, who lived in New England. He had a son about fourteen. One afternoon the boy's teacher called at the home and asked for the father, and said, 'Is your boy sick?' 'No. Why?' 'He was not at school to-day.' 'Is that so?' 'Nor yesterday.' 'You don't mean it!' 'Nor the day before.' 'Well!' 'And I supposed he was sick.' 'No, he's not sick.' 'Well, I thought I should tell you.' The father said 'Thank you,' and the teacher left.

"The father sat thinking. By and by he heard a click at the gate, and he knew that the boy was coming. He went to open the door. The boy knew when he looked up, that his father knew about those three days. And his father said 'Come into the library, Phil.' And Phil went, and the door was closed. The father said: 'Phil, your teacher was here this afternoon. He tells me you were not in school this afternoon, nor yesterday, nor the day before. And I supposed you were there. You let us think you were. And so, do you know how badly I feel. I have always trusted you. I have always said, 'I can trust my boy Phil.' And here you have been a living lie for three whole days. And I can't tell you how badly I feel.' Well that was hard on Phil to be talked to quietly like that. If his father had asked him out in the woodshed, or had spoken roughly, it wouldn't have been near so hard. Then his father said: 'Phil, we'll get down and pray.' And the thing was getting harder for Phil all the time. He didn't want to pray just then. And they got down. And the father prayed. And the boy knew as he listened how badly his father felt over his conduct. And they got up, and the father's eyes were wet, and Phil's eyes were not dry.

"Then the father said: 'Phil, there's a law of life that where there is a sin there is suffering. You can't detach these two things. You've done wrong, and I am in this home as God is in the world, so we will do this: you go up to the garret. I'll make a pallet for you there. We'll take your meals up to you at the regular time; and you stay up there as long as you have been a living lie—three days and three nights.' Phil didn't say anything. They went up stairs, the pallet was made, and the father left the boy.

"Supper time came, and the father and mother sat down to eat; but they couldn't eat for thinking about the boy. The longer they chewed upon the food the bigger it got in their mouths, and swallowing it was out of the question. Then they went into the sitting room for the evening. He picked up the evening paper to read, and she sat down to sew. His glasses seemed blurred, so he took them off and cleaned them carefully, and then he found that he had been holding the paper upside down. Her thread broke, and she couldn't seem to get the needle threaded again. By and by the clock struck ten, the usual hour for retiring, but they made no move. She said: 'Aren't you going to bed?' And he said: 'I think I'll not go yet; you go.' 'No, I guess I'll wait a bit.' The clock struck eleven and the hands worked around to twelve. Then they rose and went to bed; but not to sleep. She said: 'Why don't you go to sleep?' And he said: 'How did you know I was not sleeping? Why don't you sleep?'

"After the clock struck one he said: 'Mother, I can't stand this any longer, I am going up stairs with Phil.' And he took his pillow and went softly out of the ro and up to the attic stairs, and pressed the latch softly as not to wake the boy if he were asleep, and tipto across the attic floor to the corner by the window, a there Phil lay, wide awake, with something glistening his eyes, and what looked like stains on his cheeks. A the father got down between the sheets with the bo and their tears got mixed, and they slept. And the n night—second night—he slept in the attic with his bo and the third.

"You are not surprised to know that to-day that bo a man grown, is telling the story of Jesus with tong and life of flame in the heart China. I think that father w the best picture of God I ev saw. God couldn't take aw sin; it is here. He couldn't ta away suffering; for suffering sin's index finger, sayin 'There's something wrong here So he came down in the perso of his Son, and lay down alon side of man. That's God. A he comes and puts his li alongside of yours and min and makes us hate the bad, an long to be pure. To spend th day with him, that is the tru normal life."

With our Bible story about th returning captives, purged o their sins, entering the old Jeru salem, it will be pertinent t recall an instructive story abou the conditions on which we ca enter the New Jerusalem: "A little boy who had been blowin bubbles all the morning, tiring o play and suddenly growing seri ous, said: 'Read me that thor about heaven. It ith tho glori outh!' 'I will,' said the mother 'but first tell me, did you tak the soap out of the water?' 'Oh yes; I'm pretty thure I did. The mother read the descrip tion of the beautiful city, the streets of gold and the gates o pearl. He listened with delight, but when she read that 'no one can enter there who loveth or maketh a lie,' bounding up he said: 'I gueth I'll go and thee about that thoap.'" (Rev. 22: 15).

"THEY GAVE AFTER THEIR ABILITY UNTO THE TREASURE OF THE WORK"

This is a good text with which to correct the common idea that lying is a trivial sin—hardly more than a joke. Military men regard lying as about the most ungentlemanly of all offenses, the meanest of sins. God thought it bad enough to send swift judgment upon Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1-11). Liars are specifically excluded from heaven (Rev. 21:8). Lying is the very essence of hypocrisy (I. Tim. 4: 2), which Christ condemned more than anything except commercialism. That our word and the facts, whether in ourselves or elsewhere, do not agree, makes us hypocrites. If people generally lied, society would become anarchy. There is much perjury in the courts, but, suppose it should become the rule instead of the exception, for witnesses to lie whenever they had an interest in doing so, justice would be impossible. Not only for the sake of getting to heaven but for the sake of making a "better world" here now, be true all through. As Cyrus restored to the new Temple at Jerusalem, the sacred vessels Nebuchadnezzar had sacrilegiously stolen, so let us give back to God lips cleansed of lying and profanity, and vulgarity and evil appetites, to be golden vessels of purity and praise.

Make this a day. There is no gain
In brooding over days to come;
The message of to-day is plain,
The future's lips are ever dumb.
The work of yesterday is gone—
For good or ill let come what may;
But now we face another dawn.
Make this a day.

Mt. Tabor Camp Meeting

THE beautiful Mt. Tabor Grove, in the hills of Northern New Jersey, is becoming every year a more popular summer resort. Nearly seven hundred feet above sea level, and surrounded by some of the finest scenery in the State, its growth during the forty years of its existence, is well accounted for. The grounds cover one hundred and fifty acres, upon which over two hundred residences have been erected.

While many seek Mt. Tabor for its material attractiveness, its primary purpose as a religious gathering place is never lost sight of.

It must be acknowledged that the old-time camp meeting has practically disappeared in other parts of the country. The curious crowds do not attend, and the demonstrative features have, in a great measure, subsided. The number of unconverted persons who attend is smaller than in earlier years. Mt. Tabor, however, is one of the very few camp meetings that retains many of the primitive features. The present year has been one of the most successful for some time, and, we believe, shows that the camp meeting has a place of much importance among evangelical agencies. Throughout the season there is preaching on Sunday, and classes and prayer meetings during the week.

The regular services commenced on Aug. 8, and continued to the last Sunday of the month. Anniversary days were observed for Temperance, Epworth League, and others. The Newark Conference Camp Meeting was also held here. Addresses were made by Baptists, Presbyterians and Methodists. The singing, under the direction of Professor Stout, was particularly effective. The regular meetings have brought about a number of hopeful conversions. Daily "Children's Hour" services have been held for the young people, and brought many of them to Christ.

The second series of camp meetings, called the Holiness Camp Meetings, held for many years under the direction of Mrs. FitzGerald, and which she still attends, were under the direction of Dr. Richardson, president of the association, and Rev. J. A. Clap. During the season services are held at Mrs. FitzGerald's cottage, and are conducted by her.

Plans are already being made to greatly extend the work next year. Its efforts in behalf of Evangelical Christianity, deserves well of all followers of the Master.

Report to the People

"How are you coming on," a prominent man enquires about the movement for Industrial Peace.

It's not exactly an easy job to stop strikes, insure steady work in the factories or prevent interference with electric and railway transportation, but a practical working plan has been discovered and is now being applied in town after town.

Yes, it works, and works in a sturdy, dependable and result-producing way.

The actual operation is worth more than a hay wagon full of theories. Step by step the conditions were met and the problems solved. The labor unions assumed the form of trusts for the sale of labor. They seek better conditions for workmen but are generally managed by men for personal money-getting, and these men hold their power by forcing up wages as high as the public will stand. That in a way is right enough, but the methods are oppressive.

They use persuasion, threats, intimidation, assaults, violence and various means to force workmen to join the trust, for large membership means power and large incomes to the manipulators. Then when these trusts became powerful enough the common people were treated to a most extraordinary display of oppression and tyranny.

Industries have been stopped, causing loss of literally hundreds of millions of dollars to owners, workpeople and the community. Property has been burned, blown up and wrecked in other ways. Tens of thousands of American citizens have been assaulted and hundreds have been murdered by these labor trusts in their bloodthirsty efforts to force all the rest of humanity to implicitly obey their "orders."

These outrages have been from 10 to 100 times the volume of the overt acts toward the Negro, that brought on the Civil war. We spent money enough to almost bankrupt the nation, and the precious lives of fathers, brothers, sons and husbands enough to people it in that struggle to avenge the wrongs and insure the liberty of the black man. But the white slave of the labor trust—what about him? What about the losses, abuse, tyranny, assaults and murders? What about the thousands of decent white men and women, tied hand and foot, unable to work, move or act, except by contribution to and with consent of the trust? Human liberty and constitutional rights of an American citizen are denied them. It got so bad people were afraid to openly protest against the tyrannies because of the "black hand" style of far-reaching acts that made life a misery or wiped out the individual altogether.

Then it dawned on some of us that the people—the 780 out of every 800—were not members of the labor trust but really had to bear the oppression of the minority and be ruled by them. There are only about 20 union members in every 800 citizens. But the compact organization of the few made it possible for the labor trust, in many cases, to force their tyranny on the unorganized majority. The next natural thought was organize the people for their own protection.

That was an inspired thought.

So to put it into practical operation a big convention in Chicago two years ago formed the Citizens Industrial Association of America. It progressed slowly for, however badly hurt, people do not quickly understand practical reforms. But one after another towns organized Associations for protection and found they got it. In July, this year, the National Association headquarters was moved to New York and the work has been growing rapidly. Many more organizers are needed that the operations be rapidly extended. But any town or city can set up a good practical Association by some one man who has the interest of his town at heart, calling a few property owners together. Elect temporary officers, send to the National Association for constitution, by-laws and detailed instructions, then have a larger meeting and permanently organize. Select a good working official who can interest others and build up the Association. The cost is practically nothing if the active man will give his time, although it has been found best to pay a salaried man who will do things. Every merchant becomes interested because he prospers best when the factories are going. Every clerk, doctor, lawyer, manufacturer, teamster and independent workman likewise. Even the thrifty, law-abiding union men will help in enforcing industrial peace and maintaining the law if they can be assured freedom from union punishment, and the Citizens Association can in a practical way insure that. How do we prevent strikes?

Each local Citizens Association is thoroughly in earnest in demanding that no strikes occur, but all differences be placed before the local "Industrial Jury," made up of equal numbers of workmen and employers. The findings are made public and thus the voice of the people is expressed, carrying with it public opinion, that greatest of all powers in this country.

Does it work?

You should see the results. Do the working people want steady work and steady wages? Do the merchants, clerks, lawyers and teamsters as well as other citizens? Do the manufacturers appreciate steady peace? Do the railroad owners care to have each town on the line humming along day by day and the railroad employees living in satisfied peace? Is it worth while for people in a community to enjoy a steady flow of prosperity in place of the badly broken condition of industrial warfare now and then fixed on many communities? To produce effective work the National Association must have financial means to carry the clerical force and employ a small army of competent organizers in the field. Some prominent men, keen to detect the practical workings, have contributed liberally. Manufacturers can afford to contribute from $100.00 to $10,000.00 each. "A strike is as bad as a fire," and this is simply a very easy and certain form of strike insurance. Merchants can well afford to expend $5.00 to $25.00 a year toward the work. Philanthropic people with a motive for helping their fellows can invest their "public good" funds in no more practical way, and the working man and common citizen of small means who feels a desire to do his little share towards a great national movement for industrial peace, can send $1.00, fifty cents of which makes him a member at large of the National Citizens Industrial Association and the other 50c pays for the "Square Deal," the monthly magazine devoted to the work. The Square Deal tells in plain words what a square deal is and applies that principle to everything it prints. Each month the current questions of the day are treated and commented on, analyzed and clarified so that the "Common Man" may get facts! facts!! facts!!!

The rank mental poison spread among workmen and the public generally by the yellow journal and the violent labor papers, seems to rot the mind of the steady reader until it has about as much capacity to think sanely as a worn out rubber shoe. Anarchy and lawbreaking is being taught by these riot breeding papers to such an extent that any thoughtful man would be startled to know the facts. The condition of unrest, is cultivated by the yellow and labor papers, constantly teaching the wage earner to hate every man who owns a house or has saved a dollar. The outbursts of rioting and violent talk against police protection, the civil courts and all officers and laws that exist for the protection of the common people, shows plainly the tendency toward Socialism and Anarchy which will grow like weeds in an uncared-for garden. Men who have regard for the sacred mantle of liberty fought for, won, and handed down to us, are patriots enough to stand together and save this fair America from the chaos hinted at by the lawbreakers. But they cannot give force to their views, acting as individuals. Organization must meet present organization with superior force. When the citizens are organized, they do the work and insure industrial peace. It is the business of the National Citizens Association to organize local Associations in every community. Experience has taught the way and the results show how practical the methods are. Are you a patriot? Do you believe in steady industry? Do you want the common people to have the organization and power to rule notwithstanding the "orders" and manipulations of the labor trust or any other trust? Do you believe in maintaining the law and insuring industrial peace? If so, be you merchant, workman, clerk, lawyer, teamster, or railroad president, join the Citizens Industrial Association. It costs you 50 cents to be a member at large and 50 cents for the monthly publication, the "Square Deal," which keeps you alive as to facts. Send $1.00 bill in envelope, it's safe, almost without fail. If you have any doubt, send money order. Do your little share, and if your further interests are worth insuring, send in addition a properly computed sum for the work. If you are big enough mentally to build a big business, you have mental calibre sufficient to tell you what to do.

Will the money be honestly handled? The Association put the writer at the wheel to steer the ship and I am "most always around" and do not hesitate to give my personal guarantee, that when the finance committee make the semi-annual inspection, we will, like Uncle Abe Lincoln, when he kept post-office up at Salem, have properly receipted bills and the balance of the money to a cent, "in the sock." I receive no salary or other compensation and expect none. Now then, the practical working machinery for industrial peace is placed before you. Some good men are furnishing fuel to run it moderately. By liberal support it can be made a national power for general peace.

Women Fight the Mormon Peril

Signatures Still Pouring in for the Memorial Demanding Smoot's Removal

MRS. C. T. DONDORE
San Diego, Calif.

MRS. A. BEHNY
Annville, Pa.

IT is surprising with what energy and vigor the women have flung themselves into the campaign against polygamy. Hundreds of the Memorials demanding Apostle Smoot's removal from the U. S. Senate, have come back to Memorial headquarters in the Bible House, New York, with long lists of names, frequently running up into the hundreds, and sometimes even to the thousands. So tremendous has been the effort of these devoted women, and their work has been attended with such remarkable success, that it is due to them that they should receive public acknowledgment for valuable services to the patriotic cause they represent.

Miss Josephine Nevin, of Shippensburg, Pa., sends in a list of 1,102 names. "I ought not to take all the credit," the lady writes. "If I did start it, others worked too, as our town has a little over 3,000 inhabitants; so you see we left few houses unvisited. I urged the movement, for I realized from the first the peril our country is in if we do not put down this false doctrine."

Mrs. Mary L. Noble sends 972 signatures from Wellsville, O. Mrs. Anna M. Boulivare a list numbering 863 names. Mrs. N. A. Rosecrants, Emporia, Kan., writes: "I send the names of 544 women, which I, with the help of a few friends, secured as signers to the women's Memorial to Congress. I am glad to have been able to do this work in so great a cause. Nearly all the women in this town are glad to add their signatures to such a protest. I hope Kansas will make the voice of her women felt in driving this curse of polygamy from our nation."

Mrs. C. T. Dondore sends 428 names from San Diego, Calif., saying, "I wish I had ten times as many to send." From Mrs. Amanda M. Behny, Annville, Pa., come 346 protestants against Mormonism, and 343 signatures from Mrs. T. McKay, of North Burlington, O. Mrs. B. G. Card, of Owosso, sends 344 names, and promises more if time is extended. Miss M. Jennie Vail, of Worthington, Minn., writes: "Faithful, self-sacrificing work enables us to send 606 names; but almost every woman has been glad to sign when given an opportunity." Miss Vail wishes credit given to Mrs. John H. Scott, as the collector of many of the names upon this list. Three hundred and five signatures come from Rising Sun, O. Ellie J. Galbreath writes, "I send 243 names to women's Memorial. May the women keep on with this grand work, not only until Smoot is expelled from the Senate, but until the octopus of Mormonism has been driven from our land." Mrs. Almira Strine, with the help of her sister, gathered 245 signatures. When these ladies started out they thought they would be able to secure fifty names, but so interested did they become, they were not satisfied until they had canvassed the whole town of Etters, Pa., spending considerable time and money in the prosecution of their labors. Monmouth, Ill., is represented by 225 women. In sending this list Mrs. M. T. McClenahan writes, "I am glad so many women have faith enough to help such a good cause." Two hundred loyal, patriotic women of Shamokin, Pa., voice their protest against polygamy, these names being sent by Mrs. E. M. Emerick.

Twenty-three Memorials, each with eighteen names appended, came through the Domestic Science Association of Jefferson County, Ill. Thousands of names have been sent by the W. C. T. U., whose lists would fill a large space in this paper. Jeannette G. Nichols sends ninety-one names of the good women of Palo Alto, Calif., saying, "It would have been two or three hundred, had so many of our people not been away on their vacation. Palo Alto women want Mormonism wiped out of existence." Mrs. M. G. Williams, of Santa Rosa, Calif., writes that she has been cognizant of the horrors of Mormonism since early childhood, and wish her list of signers were much larger. The matron of the "Aged Ministers Home," of Castile, N. Y., sends a long list, and says that many of the names were obtained by a lady over eighty years of age. Miss Lydia Esch sends a list from Belleville, Pa., of 144 names. This is a long list to be gathered by one who writes that she is a cripple and well along in years. Another lady sends a list from Oklahoma, saying, "I am over eighty years of age, without help, on a farm, in harvest time."

A Brave Sunday School Girl

During the month of August I visited the town of Colfax, Calif. Being a Sunday School teacher at home, I was interested in the Sunday School there. I found among its pupils a little girl about eleven years old, named Dollie Rowell, who, for two years has walked to Sunday School a distance of seven miles (fourteen miles round trip), and has not missed a Sunday. She walks the track of the Southern Pacific Railroad. At one point the track crosses a trestle 113 feet high, and 878 feet long. If she should lose her footing, she would go through the trestle to the ravine below. Another dangerous point is noted Cape Horn, where the road clings to the precipitous bluff at a point nearly 2,000 feet above the river, and far below the summit, and where the first foothold for the daring workmen on the ledge, was gained by men who were let down with ropes from the summit. The pastor of the church is a Mr. Reeder; the superintendent is Mrs. Culver. R. D.

SHOUTED UP

In England They Politely Refer to the Stomach as "Little Mary."

Little Mary.—"I say up there, won't you please quit sending down such a variety of unnatural things to me.

"Here this morning first came down some sticky, pasty material, all starchy and only partly cooked. It was wheat or oats and was decorated with milk and sugar.

"Between the unchewed mouthfuls came gulps of coffee, finally a good big drenching of it. Then some bread and a lot of grease, perhaps it was butter, then some fried eggs and fried meat and more coffee, and some fried cakes and syrup. You load things on me as if I could stand everything.

"I try faithfully, but there's no use, I can digest part of it and the balance sours and I simply have to push it along to the liver. He says he's badly overworked now and gets so weak he almost collapses, so he sends the sour mass on down to the intestines to raise gas and trouble of all kinds. We can't help it, and you must either select your food with better reason or stand more and more trouble down here. Suppose you try us on some cooked or raw fruit, a little Grape-Nuts and cream, 2 soft-boiled (not fried) eggs, some well-browned toast and a cup of Postum. Liver and I will guarantee to make you feel the keen joy of a hearty and well man if you will send those things down to us. There's a reason, but never mind that, try it first and when you find we know what we are talking about, you may be ready to hear the reason."

After a False Start.

"In 1890 I began to drink coffee.
"At that time I was healthy and enjoyed life. At first I noticed no bad effects from the indulgence, but in course of time found that various troubles were coming upon me.
"Palpitation of the heart took unto itself sick and nervous headaches, kidney troubles followed and eventually my stomach became so deranged that even a light meal caused me serious distress.
"Our physician's prescriptions failed to help me and then I dosed myself with patent medicines till I was thoroughly disgusted and hopeless.
"Finally I began to suspect that coffee was the cause of my troubles. I experimented by leaving it off, except for one small cup at breakfast. This helped some but did not altogether relieve my distress. It satisfied me, however, that I was on the right track.
"So I gave up the old kind of coffee altogether and began to use Postum Food Coffee. In 10 days I found myself greatly improved, my nerves steady, my head clear, my kidneys working better and better, my heart's action rapidly improving, my appetite improved and the ability to eat a hearty meal without subsequent suffering restored to me. And this condition remains.
"Leaving off coffee and using Postum did this, with no help from drugs, as I abandoned the use of medicines when I began to use good coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE INDIAN CONFERENCE

ON the eighteenth of October there will open a three days' Conference at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., to consider the interests of the American Indians, and other dependent peoples. These Conferences have been held every year since 1882, and it would take a large volume to give an accurate report of all the good that has been accomplished. The Conference has the active co-operation of our Department of Indian Affairs, and the Commissioner will be one of the chief speakers. The case of the Pima Indians was taken up in the last few years, and as a result they have been restored, in part, to their former rights. The Pimas had been deprived of their water rights by the white settlers of Arizona, and were, for a time, in a state of great destitution.

Recently, a committee appointed by the Conference, has been looking after the interests of the tribes in Northern California. These tribes had been persuaded to leave their own lands by the promise of other grants. The promise was not kept, and the Indians have become vagrants. The committee brought measures for relief before the Government, and President Roosevelt has become actively interested.

The Conference last October had the fortune to be presided over by Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, then a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners and now Secretary of the Navy, a man whose genial and ready wit, versatility, and wide and thorough knowledge of the subjects under discussion, gave him a peculiar fitness for the position. At the coming session the Conference will be equally favored by the presence in the chair of the Hon. John D. Long, a predecessor of Mr. Bonaparte's in the Navy Department, and who has presided once before. The programme this year includes many strong names. Prof. Jeremiah W. Jenks, of Cornell University, who, at the request of this Government, recently investigated colonial governments in the Orient, will speak on "Practical Difficulties of Colonial Administration," with special reference to the Philippines. Mr. Robert Lincoln O'Brien, of Washington, will discuss "Optimism as an Obstacle in Colonial Administration." Other speakers on Philippine topics will be Dr. Frederick W. Atkinson, who spoke last year, and Gen. Frederick Dent Grant, U. S. A. Porto Rico will be represented by Drs. M. G. Brumbaugh and Samuel McCune Lindsay, both formerly Superintendents of Education there, and by Dr. Jose M. Barbosa, of San Juan, a member of the Porto Rican Executive Council. Affairs in Hawaii will be brought out by Hon. William R. Castle, of Honolulu, who was Hawaiian Minister at Washington, under the Hawaiian republic, and more recently a member of the Hawaiian Legislature, and by Hon. Gorham D. Gilman and Prof. Frank A. Hosmer. Conditions in Alaska will be the subject of an address by Dr. Sheldon Jackson, the "little giant" of the Alaskan educational department. "The Indian Problem from the View-point of a Field Worker" will be discussed by Mr. S. M. McCowan, Superintendent of the Chillocco Indian School, and Director of the Indian Exhibit at the St. Louis Fair of last year. Other addresses on Indian matters are hoped for.

HON. VON L. MEYER

BARON ROTHSCHILD

THE DOWAGER EMPRESS OF CHINA made the visit of the Taft party to her palace at Peking a very enjoyable one. She was especially attracted by the brightness of Miss Roosevelt and gave a special reception in her honor, the first time such a thing has been done, probably, in the history of the present Chinese dynasty. The example of the Empress was contagious, and Miss Roosevelt was given an elaborate reception and dinner a short time afterward by the Emperor and Empress of Korea.

PRESIDENT RAFAEL REYES, of Colombia, has declared himself dictator, and has imprisoned the Supreme Court at Bogota. At last reports, public indignation was at a high pitch, and fighting was going on in the streets. General Reyes is probably one of the most able men in all South America: but it is thought that his present action can result only in a series of revolts, that may drive him from office, if not from the country, eventually.

HON. VON L. MEYER, American Ambassador to Russia, has returned to this country for a short stay. It has been reported that he is on a special mission from the Czar to President Roosevelt, in connection with the new diplomatic questions that have arisen as a result of the recent declaration of peace. Ambassador Meyer had a very active part in the recent negotiations, as all communications from President Roosevelt and our State Department passed through his hands, and were, in many cases, presented personally by him to Nicholas II. Before taking the position at St. Petersburg, Mr. Meyer was for a number of years our representative at Rome.

BARON NATHAN ROTHSCHILD, the head of the world-famous banking house, who died recently, left to charity $5,000,000. It will be used for the general relief of the poor. His work for his own people was not confined to his own land, but was extended to several places in America.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Law of the Kingdom*

IT is, I think, worth while sometimes, to set alongside of one another in outline, first, the laws of our country upon some of the great moral duties which can be enforced by a Christian State, and then the laws or principles which, on the same subjects, are laid down by our Christian Society as such, and are equally obligatory upon us who are members of that Society.

For example, the laws of our country enjoin and even enforce—to a degree that is sometimes forgotten—the moral duties of honesty, of purity, of temperance, and of charitable care for the poor and sick.

They do this up to a certain point and no further. For example, as regards honesty: the State says, "You shall not cheat, you shall not forge, you shall not unduly adulterate the goods you sell, you shall not violate a written contract," and so on.

By the law of Christ, the law of Christ's Society—the Society, remember, to which you and I belong, and to whose laws or principles we have pledged our allegiance—lays down with equal clearness certain further injunctions or principles in this matter of honesty, quite outside the State's compulsory rules; for example, the duty of straightforwardness and truthfulness, of scrupulous fairness in every controversy, and of quiet deliberate consideration for the other side.

Or, again, as regards what we distinctively call social and domestic purity. The law of the land forbids certain gross violations of the marriage bond, certain specific offences against helpless children, and a few other notable misdeeds, among them the publication and sale of grossly indecent literature. And there it stops. But there the Christian law, or the Christian principle—and remember again that we have voluntarily accepted its obligation—does not stop. Christ's Society, whereof we are members, bids us use the strength of manhood to shield from harm every woman and girl in the land. It bids us denounce the miserable, the contemptible cowardice of that kind of vice, and it upholds absolutely and quite unreservedly the same standard of purity for woman and for man. Such is the citizenship to which we are pledged.

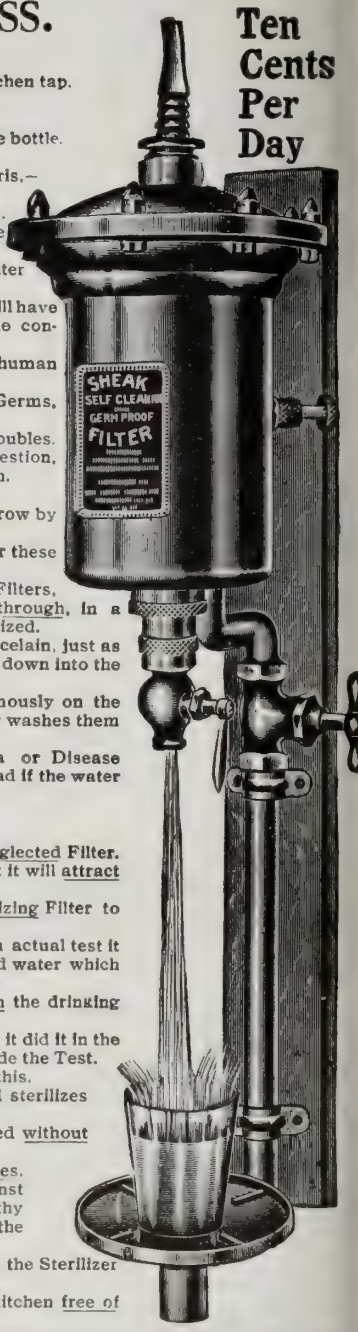
BOOKS RECEIVED

The Story of Columbus and Magellan; by Thomas Bonaventure Lawler. 151 pages. The author, after giving a preliminary account of the Portuguese explorers, describes in a vivid way the voyages and explorations of Columbus. As an introduction to the story of Magellan's voyages and the settlement of the Philippines, a full account is given of the discovery of Porto Rico, the finding of the Pacific, and Cortez's conquest of Mexico. It is one of the best books, in a concise form, that we have seen dealing with this important period of exploration and conquest. The illustrations are a great aid to the text. Published by Ginn & Company, New York, Boston, Chicago. Price, 45 cents.

The Homophonic Vocabulary, by Charles B. Waite, A.M. The author claims that the first step toward a Universal Language should be a Common Language for the Indo-Germanic family, and that this common language must be based upon words already in common use. Impressed with the importance of this principle, he has taken, as representing the principal peoples of the Indo-Germanic family, ten languages, viz: English, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, German, Dutch, Danish-Norwegian, Swedish, and Russian; and has undertaken to observe how many words there were in common use, having a like sound and a like signification in these various tongues. He expected to find but a few hundred; but to his surprise, after three years' labor, he had over two thousand words of that character, being all those most in common use. This list, carefully revised and corrected, is now published as the basis for Common Root Words upon which a Common Language for the Indo-Germanic family may be constructed. Besides the Vocabulary, the book contains an explanatory article in English, and a synopsis of the same article translated into the other nine languages. Also a title page and preface in each. Price $2. Published by C. V. Waite & Co., 479 Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Ill.

How Tap Water causes Sickness.

Ten Cents Per Day



FILL a clear glass bottle with water from the kitchen tap.
Let it stand still a couple of days.
Then look closely into it.
Then note the sediment on the bottom of the bottle.
Well, what is that sediment?
It is dead Animal matter,—rotting Vegetable debris,—Offal.
These turn into Bacteria, as cheese turns into Mites.
Bacteria are little living things, invisible to the eye but active as mosquitoes.
Another name for them is Germs—"Water Germs." They breed by the million.
A teaspoonful of average city water from the tap will have 12,000 to 60,000 of these living Germs, according to the condition of the water supply and of the plumbing.
Some of these Bacteria are deadly poison to the human system, when they are numerous enough.
Such are the Typhoid Germs, and the Cholera Germs, that spread epidemics.
Others cause Diarrhoea and Intestinal (bowel) troubles.
Others prey upon the health through the Digestion, weakening the system and setting up inside irritation.
Ask your Doctor!
Old plumbing gets full of these Bacteria, which grow by the million in a slimy mass around it.
And, most kitchen Filters are mere Incubators for these very Germs.
The Bacteria that the filtering material, in most Filters, stop from going through with the water grow through, in a week's time if not daily removed and weekly sterilized.
Yes, they will GROW through even stone or porcelain, just as a cancer grows, or just as the roots of a plant grow down into the earth.
Then, having grown through, they multiply enormously on the outside of the filter tap from which the running water washes them into your drinking glass.
Then, you have twenty times as many Bacteria or Disease Germs in your glass of Water as you would have had if the water had not passed through the unclean Filter at all.

The most dangerous thing in any kitchen is a neglected Filter.
It's like having a lightning rod so badly fitted that it will attract lightning but fail to carry it off.
Now, there's only one self-cleaning and self-sterilizing Filter to be had, at any price.
That is the Sheak Safety Filter pictured here. On actual test it took 19,960 Bacteria out of a teaspoonful of unfiltered water which had previously contained over 20,000 to the spoonful.
It thus left only 40 Bacteria out of 20,000 odd in the drinking water. Over 99 per cent were thus filtered out.
The Sheak Filter will do this in your home just as it did it in the Laboratory of Bacteriologist B. P. Nelson, who made the Test.
Let us set one up in your kitchen and we'll prove this.
The "Sheak" is the only Filter that cleans and sterilizes itself automatically.
It is the only Filter that can be cleaned or sterilized without being taken apart for the purpose.
To clean it you simply turn a tap for two minutes. This sets the stone filtering cylinder revolving against a steel cutting edge that grinds all the Germs, and filthy accumulations, off the face of the stone and into the waste water pipe.
To sterilize it you simply touch a lighted match to the Sterilizer shown in our book on page 10.
Now, this Sheak Safety Filter we install in your kitchen free of charge, on a fortnight's trial.
Then you may pay us Ten Cents a day rental for it, till you own it outright in a few months.
Isn't Ten Cents a day a small price for Health Insurance to the whole Family,—for protection against Typhoid Cholera, Diarrhoea and other water Germs, to say nothing of the Filth this Filter takes out of the Water?
Write us today for our free book, entitled, 'Sanitary Dangers," which tells about Water Germs and Home Protection
Or, shall we install a Sheak Filter at once, in your kitchen, on two weeks' trial, at 10 cents a day? Write today, while you think of it, to The Sheak Filter Co., P. O. Box 16, Binghamton, N. Y.

GARDENS

THE wide, fair gardens, the rich, lush gardens,
Which no man planted and no man tills;
Their strong seeds drifted, their brave bloom lifted,
Near and far over vales and hills;
Sip the bees from their cups of sweetness,
Poises above them the wild, free wing,
And night and morn from their doors are borne
The dreams of the tunes that blithe hearts sing.

The waving gardens, the fragrant gardens,
That toss in the sun by the broad highway;
Growing together, gorse and heather,
Aster and golden rod, all the day;
Poppies dark, with the wine of slumber,
Daisies bright, with the look of dawn,
The gentian blue, and the long year through
The flowers that carry the seasons on.

The dear old gardens, the pleasant gardens,
Where mother used to potter about,
Trying and pulling, and sparingly culling,
And watching each bud as its flower laughed out.
Hollyhocks here, and the prince's feather,
Larkspur and primrose and lilies white,
Sweet were the dear, old-fashioned gardens,
Where we kissed the mother and said "Good night."

Kansas Women and the Bible

THE letter written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mrs. J. G. Wood, entitled: "Kansas Women and the Bible" has brought me many letters, full of all sorts of inquiries. I have answered many, but the main thought being the same, I feel they might best all be answered through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

How did you begin your work? There is only one way to begin any organization. Ask people to join with you to the end in view. Full of love for the purpose in hand, willing to put aside everything for the cause, will make a success of anything.

In the subject on hand, Bible Study, not so much depends on the knowledge of the leader as on his management. We do most when we help someone to help himself. No member of a Study Class has had the best help, unless he takes a part. The leader who will plan to know her people, be able to call them by name, give each one something to do, and then be sure to ask for what they do, asking a question or so to draw out further ideas, perhaps adding a thought of her own, complimenting a new thought or original idea, never criticising, will not work long until she will have a class brimful of enthusiasm, confident, and ready to follow anywhere.

Yes, I believe in pictures, and have used the Perry, Brown and Leeper penny pictures for regular recitations, with lantern slides, during the last two years; but these are only luxuries which have come with the years, and of course help to interest, but they are not essentials.

Books for a general class are not necessary, only the Bible. Best results come through few books, but these must be thoroughly familiar to the leader. The very best "helps" I know of are the manuals in connection with the Blakeslee Bible Lessons. These, with a good dictionary, will be more than sufficient.

The best course to follow? No one could suggest. It would depend on the leader and the object desired. To study the Bible through appeals to many, while others only care for parts. Two large classes here have successfully followed through the "Blakeslee Bible Studies, Progressive Grade." Copies of the outline will be sent on addressing: Bible Study Publishing Company, 95 South Street, Boston, Mass. The last class organized here two years ago, of more than one hundred members, have nothing but the Bible. We are studying through by chapters. The interest has been intense and the enthusiasm unabated. Whether it is on account of the plan of study, or whether it is owing to the growing interest in the study of the Bible, I am not prepared to say. Stanley, Edersheim, and Geike, have given me most, personally. "Synthetic Bible Studies," by James M. Gray, and Newell's "Old Testament Studies," both to be had from the Bible Institute, 250 La Salle Ave., Chicago, have been the most suggestive for teaching.

How A South Bend Watch Is Adjusted To Heat And Cold.

DOES NOT VARY ONE SECOND A MONTH.

A clock runs faster in winter than in summer. The pendulum is a weight suspended on a wire which swings back and forth to regulate the clock. If you want the clock to run faster you raise the weight, and lower it if you desire it to go slower.

All metals are affected by heat and cold.

When it is cold the pendulum wire contracts, or draws up, which makes it swing faster. When it is hot it expands, becomes longer, and the clock runs slower.

Clock makers overcome the effects of heat and cold by placing a tube of mercury on the weight of the pendulum so that when it is cold the mercury goes to the bottom of the tube, and when it is hot it goes to the top. This always keeps the center of weight at the same place and overcomes the changes made by the temperature.

Instead of having a pendulum, a watch is provided with a balance wheel to regulate the movement. A balance wheel is affected by heat and cold just like a pendulum.

In order to perfectly regulate the movement of the watch and insure correct time, the balance wheel must be delicately adjusted so there will be no place on the wheel that is heavier than any other place. This is called poise.

All watches are not adjusted to such conditions. When they become hot the wheel expands. The spoke which runs across the wheel keeps the rim from getting wider in that direction, so it bulges the other way. Cold has the reverse effect.

The balance wheel in all South Bend watches provides for such conditions. It has a small opening in the rim near the spoke, so when it expands it takes up the open space, and when it contracts it can do so without bulging.

No adjusted South Bend watch is ever sent out until it has kept perfect time—no change of even a second a month—in a refrigerator at freezing point and in a heater at 100 degrees Fahrenheit. It must also keep perfect time in every position and not be affected by the jars received on railroad trains, horseback riding and automobiling. We guarantee them to be perfect time keepers.

South Bend watches are sold only by reliable jewelers. You can get them nowhere else. If your jeweler does not sell them send us his name and we will mail you an interesting book, "How Good Watches Are Made."

Better Work*

NEAR the close of his life, the great Apostle declared that he was still pressing toward the mark. He did not count himself to have attained, or to be already perfect, but was reaching forward. It is a true sign of greatness, and indeed of all life, to be growing and striving to gain a higher plane. The artist or the author who is satisfied with his work, who sees nothing better that he can do than he has done, has passed the climax of his career, and his day of achievement is ended. To press forward, to become better, and to do better work, ought to be the ambition of men in every department of life. In religion there is no limit to the possibility of progress. The graces of the Christian character never so thoroughly govern and inspire a man's life, that there is no further need of development. And in respect of work, there is always imperfection that is regretfully remembered, and faults that may be eliminated. Besides that, there is the ever growing opportunity demanding new energy and increased effort.

What is true of the individual is true of the association. There ought to be in every young people's society a strenuous effort after mutual helpfulness, a strong endeavor to raise the spiritual standard of attainment, and a dilligent effort to render the agency more efficient in winning souls for Christ's kingdom. That is the purpose and object of religious association. It is the way the kingdom grows, and it does not grow when those who are in it cease to strive for new victories. The barren fig tree was beautiful in its wealth of foliage, but the only reason for its existence was that it should bear fruit. Failing in that it only cumbered the ground. It becomes us then to look back over the past years, to note wherein we have failed, to see the opportunities we have missed, and to seek a quickening of our perceptions, and greater energy in the performance of our duties.

An earnest evangelist, talking with his wife over the defects of their one servant, heard with regret that the girl was to be dismissed. She had failed in this and in that; she was not clean nor industrious, and she neglected to do the things she was told to do. "I will not bear with her any longer," said the wife, "I have lost patience with her and will not keep her in my service another week." The evangelist sighed deeply. "I hope my Master will not say that about me," he said. "I am afraid I often do my work in a slovenly way and I know I do not do all that I ought to do, but he has had patience with me a long time, and I hope he will keep me on." It was a sympathetic remark and the girl had another trial.

The story is told of a preacher who was contemporary with the Wesleys, that he met another minister whom he did not know. He heard, however, that he came from the town in which the famous Mr. Fletcher labored. "You probably know a fellow-townsman of yours," he said, "one John Fletcher, whose learning, talents, and piety both the Wesleys think of so highly." His acquaintance answered, "Yes, I know him intimately, and if the Wesley's knew him as well as I do, they would not esteem him so highly." "Indeed," said the clergyman, "you surprise me; you must surely be mistaken." "No," said the other, "I have the best of reasons, for I am John Fletcher, and I know my faults better than any one."

"How does a great character come?" asked a boy of his father, who was a preacher. "It is like that river," was the answer. "at the source, it is a little moisture oozing through the sand; in another it is a dripping from a rock. Then it meanders, a feeble brook, until another brook adds its flow and then it widens, and bye and bye it receives other accretions, until it is deep, and it turns mills and bears gallant ships on its bosom. Only it must move steadily on toward the sea and must not stagnate. Always motion and steady progress. So with a man, he gains help from others and receives fresh supplies of divine grace and does works of usefulness, until at last it comes to the great sea when it is at its widest."

How Lamps Eat the Life out of Air.

HERE is a Lighting Test worth trying!

Take a common dinner plate.

Pour half a glass of water into it.

Then set an inch of candle upright in the water.

Then light the candle wick.

Now, turn an empty glass upside down on the plate, over the candle while it is still burning briskly as in picture No. 1.

—And note what happens!

The candle will die out a moment after the glass has been turned over it. Then the water will rush up into the glass, from off the level plate, and it will stay in the upside-down glass which you can then turn over, plate upwards, without spilling. (See Figure 2.)

Now why does the candle die out so suddenly when the glass encloses it?

And why does the water rush up into the inverted glass after the candle has been lighted in it?

Because, the flame has instantly burnt out all the Oxygen of the Air which was originally in the glass.

That left a vacancy where the Oxygen used to be—a vacuum.

And that vacuum caused a suction which drew the water upward into the glass, like a pump, to take the place of the burnt-out Oxygen.

The candle flame died out so suddenly because no flame can live without Oxygen—just as no Animal nor Vegetable can live without Oxygen.

You see, the Air is about one-fifth Oxygen.

And, when you burn that vital fifth out of it with flame, or use it up in breathing, you take the very Life out of the Air. What then remains is chiefly poisonous Carbonic Acid.

You couldn't live five minutes in a room that had all the Oxygen burnt out of it.

Nor could you light a lamp, a match, nor a fire, in a room that had not considerable Oxygen left in it to support the flame.

If you want to prove this try the following experiment:

Take the same drinking glass as in previous Test and throw a lighted match into it.

That match will burn freely.

Then light another match, breathe outward deeply into the glass twice, with your face pressing against its edge closer than in picture. Then quickly drop the lighted match into it.

The flame will, this time, die out instantly.

What causes its sudden extinction?

Well, here is the cause; The Oxygen you breathe inwardly, with the Air, to your lungs, goes into your blood to purify it.

And, the Air you breathe outwardly from your lungs has therefore no Oxygen left in it to feed the flame of the match. It is full of Carbonic Acid—full of poisonous waste products, like the foul Air in a room from which the Oxygen has been exhausted through lamps or overbreathing.

You see Carbonic Acid is death to flame, just as it is death to Human Beings who re-breathe it too often without enough ventilation.

As we breathe 16 to 20 times a minute you will readily see what happens to our Lungs, Blood, and System, when we burn Kerosene Lamps, Gasoline-Gas, or City Gas, year in and year out, in our living and sleeping rooms.

These Lights burn a great deal of the Life out of Air—its Blood-purifying and Germ-destroying Oxygen.

And they leave behind an injurious excess of Carbonic Acid in the air we must breathe after it.

Now this excess of Carbonic Acid Gas, with want of Oxygen, in the foul Air of a room creates six injurious conditions:

1st,—It causes the Blood to partially stagnate.

2nd,—It causes the Muscles to feel Tired.

3rd,—It causes the Heart to act slowly.

4th,—It causes the Digestion to Delay.

5th,—It causes Headache, through clogging of Blood in the Brain.

6th,—It causes Catarrh of the Nose, Throat and Air passages.

These are well-known, easily proved, Facts. Ask your Doctor!

Of course, you may not have noticed these effects at the time the Lamps were burning, or if you did notice them you may not have known they were caused by want of Oxygen and excess of Carbonic Acid.

But, you may rely upon this—

In some degree these effects are produced every time you burn a Kerosene Lamp, or City Gas Jet, in the living or sleeping room, without wide open windows that create a draught to replace the burnt Oxygen.

And that Lighted Lamp, or City Gas Jet, for 365 nights in the year, eats up, little by little, a large share of the Energy and Life you get from Food and Sunlight.

That loss to your Health amounts to more than you probably think it does, year after year.

Put a lighted Kerosene Lamp in a closed up room and it will indicate your loss.

You'll find that lamp will burn itself out in time, though there be plenty of oil in the bowl and plenty of wick in the burner.

The flame will die-out for want of the very Oxygen it consumed.

Now, this is where Acetylene Light comes into the story.

Acetylene Light uses up only one fourth as much Oxygen as Kerosene Light, Gasoline Light, or City Gaslight does.

And, it leaves less than a tenth as much Poisonous Carbonic Acid in the Air that a Kerosene Lamp, a Gasoline Light, or a City Gaslight, of equal candle power leaves.

Moreover! Acetylene Gas is not poisonous enough to give you even a slight headache if you left a jet turned on full pressure and unlighted, for a whole night in your bedroom while you slept there.

Because, Acetylene is just pure, unadulterated Light, and nothing else but Light. Kerosene, Gasoline, and City Gas, are about one-tenth Light, and nine-tenths useless and poisonous other things.

Acetylene, because it is so pure and unadulterated, gives a beautiful White Light which is almost the same, in composition, as Sunlight.

It is so much like true, natural Sunlight that plants and flowers grow under its rays (24 hours continuously night and day) just as they grow under natural Sunlight during the day only.

That has been proven at Cornell University this very year—double growth under Acetylene Light.

And, the effect of Acetylene Light upon Human beings has been proven to be like the effect of Sunlight upon them, for the self-same reasons that it makes plants grow night and day under its wholesome rays.

That's one of the wonderful things explained in a little book, called "Sunlight on Tap," which I want to send you free if you write me for it today.

Tremendous improvements have been made in Acetylene Lighting lately.

It is cheaper now than even Kerosene Light — a third cheaper.

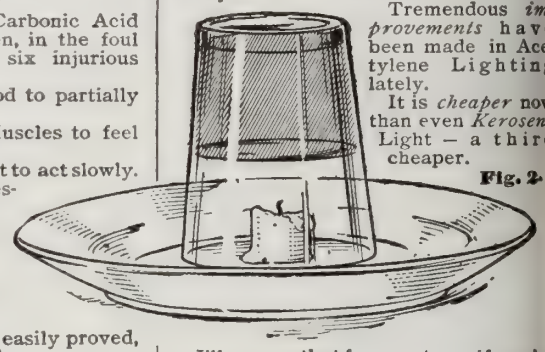

Fig. 2.

I'll prove that for you too,—if you're interested.

Two million United States People now use Acetylene Light.

They live chiefly in small Towns, and in the Country, where Acetylene is now found far more convenient, more economical, and infinitely safer than Kerosene or any other Light.

No good Farmhouse, Country Residence, Village Home, or Village Store, would be without modern Acetylene Light if their Owners knew what I know now about it, since its recent improvement and reduction in cost.

And I want everyone who owns a home or store, in Village, Town, or Country, to write me for my free book called "Sunlight on Tap," which tells some mighty interesting facts about Reading Lights — and other Lights.

Just tell me how many rooms there are in your house. Then, I'll tell you about how much it would cost you to light them with brilliant Acetylene, instead of with murky, bad-smelling Kerosene, Gasoline, or City Gas.

Think of all the daily Lamp-Cleaning, Breakage, and Risk you could save by getting rid of Kerosene alone!

Just address me as — "Acetylene Jones," 158 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ills., and write today.

Restored to Palestine

By Mrs. M. Baxter

LONG before the captivity of Judah or of Israel, King David had written by inspiration, "When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice and Israel shall be glad" (Psalm 53: 6). But it was left for Jeremiah (30: 18; 31: 23), to tell of the return of Judah from the captivity of Babylon, in prophecies which, however, include the yet future return of God's people to Palestine, while, in their primary sense, they refer to the return of the Jews to their own land after the seventy years' captivity, which he foretold (Jer. 25: 11, 12). Ezekiel, who was himself a captive in Babylon, also tells of their return from captivity (Ezek. 39: 25), but this again refers to their approaching final deliverance.

Daniel had read Jeremiah's prophecies in Babylon, and was deeply stirred when he perceived that the expiration of the seventy years prophesied by him was at hand, and he "set himself" to pray, to confess his sins and his people's with fasting and sackcloth and ashes. Occupied as he needs must be with the pressing affairs of the kingdom, the things of God took a primary place in his heart; politics could wait, God must not be expected to wait. He sought first the kingdom of God before all else (Matt. 6: 33). It was not enough that God had said he would bring again his people. God himself says, "I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them" (Ezek. 36: 37). Thus, when God stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, of whom he had spoken by Isaiah, as his chosen instrument, about one hundred and seventy years before, saying that he had called him for his servant Jacob's sake (Isa. 44: 28; 45: 14), there was a band of believing and praying people ready to meet God and understand his working when he began to deliver them; people who trusted his word utterly.

It was God, and no influence of man, that stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. But Daniel was still living; and while he lived, his miraculous history and that of his friends could not but be known to Cyrus; and the name of Jehovah, and his fame as the God of Daniel, could not be unknown. Whether this king had read of himself in Isaiah's prophecies we know not, but it is more than probable that he was familiar with the words God had spoken regarding him, and that they had made a strong impression upon him, written, as they had been, five or six generations before he lived: "Thus saith the Lord, I have raised him up in righteousness, I will direct all his ways: he shall build my city, and he shall let go my captives, not for price nor reward, saith the Lord of hosts," must have deeply worked upon the mind of this man.

Thus, in the first year of his reign, this king, just when the children of Israel would be complete masters of the language of Babylon, and being always a people especially gifted intellectually, a people possessing unusual perseverance and endurance, and therefore a very desirable people to retain as a strength to his commercial prosperity, Cyrus begins, at considerable personal and political sacrifice, to do God's pleasure, and proclaim a release to his Iraelitish captives. He made a proclamation, and, to make it more sure, "put it in writing, saying, Thus saith Cyrus, king of Persia, the Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth." It was a distinct acknowledgment that he himself owed fealty and did obeisance to Israel's God. "And he hath charged me to build him a house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah." Was this in obediance to Isaiah's prophecy, or had this man received in person a direct message from God himself? Probably both. It was as free a release from captivity as could have been conceived.

THE AMERICAN WATCH

How a WALTHAM WATCH Set England's Time

26 Ormiston Road, Westcombe Park,
London, S. E.
England, 10-2-'97.

American Waltham Watch Co.,
Waltham, Mass., U. S. A.

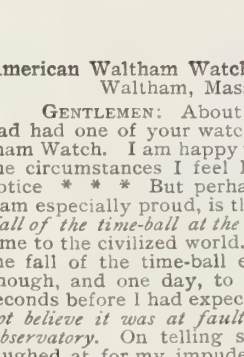
GENTLEMEN: About three years since, acting on the advice of a friend who had had one of your watches for about eighteen years, I purchased a Lever Waltham Watch. I am happy to say it has turned out a marvel of accuracy, and under the circumstances I feel I am only doing my duty in bringing this fact to your notice * * * But perhaps this most unique performance, and the one of which I am especially proud, is the fact that by its aid I was able to detect an error in the fall of the time-ball at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, which gives the standard time to the civilized world. It happened as follows: I make a practice of watching the fall of the time-ball each day at 1 o'clock P. M., whenever the air is clear enough, and one day, to my surprise, I found the ball had dropped some few seconds before I had expected it to. I had such confidence in my watch that I did not believe it was at fault, and felt sure that some mistake had been made at the Observatory. On telling some of my friends of my convictions, I was simply laughed at for my impudence in daring to pit my Waltham watch against the accuracy of the Royal Observatory. However, to set the matter at rest, I wrote to the Astronomer Royal, telling him of my conviction, and asking him if he would let me know whether I was right or wrong. In return I received a courteous reply from the Astronomer Royal, stating that I was quite right, and that on the day named, owing to an accident, the ball was dropped about eighteen seconds too soon. This seems to me such a remarkable proof of the reliability of your watches that I feel justified in bringing it to your notice. If you would care to have the Astronomer Royal's letter as a memento, I should be pleased to hear from you to that effect. Wishing every success and prosperity to your deservedly world-famed Company, I remain, Yours very sincerely,

THOMAS WHEATE.

"Taken from the Enemy"

The following is a translation of a part of a speech delivered in Switzerland, November, 1876, by M. Edw. Favre-Perret, the chief Commissioner in the Swiss Department and member of the International Jury on watches at the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia, and is worthy the attention of every good American.

"Gentlemen, here is what I have seen. I asked from the manager of the Waltham Company a watch of a certain quality. He opened before me a big chest. I picked out a watch at random and fixed it to my chain. The manager asked me to leave the watch with him for three or four days, that they might regulate it. On the contrary, I said to him, 'I want to keep it just as it is to get an exact idea of your workmanship.' On arriving at Locle I showed this watch to one of our first adjusters . . who took it apart. At the end of several days he came to me and said literally: 'I am astonished; the result is incredible. You do not find a watch to compare with that in 50,000 of our make.' This watch, I repeat to you, gentlemen, I myself took offhand from a large number, as I have said. One can understand by this example how it is that an American watch should be preferred to a Swiss watch."



RALPH WALDO EMERSON
From a drawing made in 1857 by S. W. Rowse, now in possession of C. E. Norton.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, the Concord Philosopher, used the Waltham Watch as a type of the highest development when he wrote in one of his Essays on Eloquence, in speaking of a man whom he described as a leader, and a Godsend to his community:

"He is put together like a Waltham Watch."

HERBERT SPENCER in his Autobiography, Vol. II, Page 167, American Edition:

"The presentation watch named in Prof. Youmans' letter, was one of those manufactured by the Waltham Watch Company. . . . It has proved a great treasure as a time-keeper, and has excited the envy of friends who have known its performances" *

HERBERT SPENCER

* "I find in a letter written in December, 1880, after the watch had been in my possession fourteen years, a paragraph respecting it which may be quoted:—'I have several times intended to tell you how wonderfully well my American watch has been going of late. It has always gone with perfect regularity, either losing a little or gaining a little; but of course it has been difficult to adjust its regulator to such a nicety as that there should be scarcely any loss or gain. This, however, was done last summer. It was set by the chronometer-maker in July, and it is now half a minute too slow; never having varied more than half a minute from the true time since the period when it was set. This is wonderful going. As the Admiral says, one might very well navigate a ship by it.'"

("In 1890 it went with equal nicety; lost 42 seconds in half a year.")

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

Mrs. F. E. D., Omaha, Neb. Who was Samson's mother?

Her name is nowhere given in the Scriptures. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says she was "celebrated for her beauty and excelling her contemporaries," and beyond this, and the fact related in the Bible that she was pious and obedient to the heavenly message, little is known.

A. S. P., Clarmont. When was the shield last used in battle by Europeans?

In Western Europe, it was used by the Scotch Highlanders under Prince Charles Edward Stuart, in the campaign of 1745-6. It was called a target or targe. It was made of wood, and covered with bull's hide, and studded with brass or silver nails arranged in ornamental designs. Fastened on the left arm, its bearer could easily parry bayonet thrusts. We believe that some of the tribes of Russia used metal targets at even a later date.

J. W. L., St. John, Wash. I have been reading with much interest a great deal of what has been said in regard to the acceptance of "tainted money" by the churches. I have just read your editorial on that subject in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for September 20, and wish to say that it accords the most nearly with my own ideas of anything that I have seen written upon that subject. There is, however, it seems to me, one very important phase of the question that is almost entirely ignored. What effect does the acceptance of such gifts have upon the churches themselves? . . . . . In a prominent city in this State, a man concluded that the State law against keeping the saloons open on Sunday ought to be enforced. He went to the pastor of every church in the city, and begged assistance in securing evidence and the moral support of their churches. In every instance he was refused. It transpired later that the saloon-keepers were paying liberally to the churches, with the tacit understanding that no effort would be made to enforce the liquor laws. These statements are scattered broadcast in the secular press and are not denied by those most interested.

A church which accepts gifts as the price of silence, when its voice ought to be raised against sin in every form, cannot make any progress on spiritual lines. It may become rich and influential, in a worldly way, but like the church of Laodicea (Rev. 3: 14, 15, 16), it will receive the due reward for its indifference to the vital things of the Gospel of Jesus. However, we are not to be the judges in such matters.

C. E. P., Laconia, N. H. Where was Jenny Lind, the famous singer, born, and when did she come to the United States?

Jenny Lind was born at Stockholm, Sweden, in 1821. She came to this country in 1850, under the auspices of P. T. Barnum, and her concert tour was most successful. Her voice was soprano and of marvelous range. She married Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and died several years ago.

Sol S., Canton, Mass. Who was the man Las Casas, who shared the exile of Emperor Napoleon at St. Helena?

Emmanuel Dieudonne, Comte de Las Casas, was a French historian, born near Revel, France, in 1766. He was a lieutenant in the navy before the Revolution. After Napoleon became Consul, Las Casas established himself as a bookseller in Paris. He wrote a historical atlas, which pleased the Emperor, who made him a baron. After Waterloo, Las Casas obtained leave to share Napoleon's exile, who there dictated to him a part of his Memoirs. After Napoleon's death, Las Casas published a Memorial of St. Helena. He died in Passy, France, in 1842.

Mrs. J. K., Springfield, So. Dak. 1. Do you think that Amos 2: 1 is speaking against cremation? 2. What do you think is the meaning of Acts 15: 21?

1. No. It refers to a specific offense. When the kings of Israel, Judah and Edom, combined against Mesha, King of Moab, the latter, failing in the battle to capture the King of Edom, as he greatly wished to do, took the King of Edom's son and heir-apparent (who had fallen into his hands), and burned him to death on the wall (see II. Kings 3: 27). This is the view taken by Michaelis, Pusey and other commentators. Others hold that it was the King of Moab's own son who was offered up on the wall, and Josephus sustains this view. There is a Hebrew tradition that Moab, after the war and when the King of Edom was dead, took his bones out of the grave and burned them. None of the three interpretations conflicts with the passage in Amos. 2. It means that the Jews still read the ancient law, and the authority of Moses was in no danger of declining among them.

Waterville Reader. What is the derivation of the word "tawdry"?

It is supposed to come from St. Audries, an ancient Abbey in the south of England, now a manor house. The nuns used to sell small knickknacks, and the word "St. Audries" was corrupted into tawdry, meaning something showy and cheap. St. Audrie, or St. Audry, is also known more properly as St. Ethelbreda.

Any reader of this paper who has been personally interested in Armenian work, and who is disposed to aid a young and deserving Armenian student now in this country, may do so by addressing Mikael Deacon, State University of Iowa, Iowa City, Ia.

Castalia, Iowa. Who is the author of the lines, "Hitch your wagon to a star"?

They were written by Ralph Waldo Emerson.

J. Schofield, Seymour, Can. Some years ago, in a knife shop here, where I worked, they broke a grindstone, and in the centre was a live toad. I told this to my friends, but they could not believe it. Have any of your readers ever seen or heard of a similar case?

Many years ago, the alleged discovery of a live frog or some other reptile embedded in rock, attracted the attention of the scientific journals. The general attitude seemed to be one of doubt, there being so many opportunities for fraud. Any discovery of the sort, to be seriously considered, would need the support of strong, indisputable evidence.

M. M. J., Shelton, Wash. What State offered to put a statue of Pierre Marquette in the National Capital?

The State of Wisconsin chose the statue of Marquette, as one of the two to be placed in the old Senate Chamber in the capitol at Washington.

Reader, Redwood, Calif. How do the people of Venice, Italy, dispose of their dead?

There are in the Bay of Venice several islands, called the Cemetery Islands, where the dead are buried as in other countries.

Reader, Ticonderoga, N. Y., writes:

Reading the article on "Bibles in Hotels," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it made me think of what once happened to me. I was stopping at the —— Hotel some five years ago. After doing business in New York all day, I went to my hotel tired out; after dinner I went to my room early. After reading the daily paper, I saw a Bible on the stand. I took it up, and learned the Lord's Prayer. I had lived to twenty-five years and never knew this prayer, and I have said it every night and morning ever since. I am not a Christian, but would like to be very much. I hope you may get Bibles into the hotel bedrooms, for I know it would do heaps of good. I have never seen a Bible in a hotel since that time.

Ray E. S., Lyndon, Kan. Will you please, in Questions and Answers, give the poem beginning, "The night has a thousand eyes," with name of author?

Francis W. Bourdillon is the author. The complete verse reads:

The night has a thousand eyes
And the day but one,
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the dying sun.

M. M. R., New York. What is the debt of the United States?

$2,304,697,418.64.

Miss Mary S. H., Washington, D. C., writes:

I saw in your paper a request to know about there being a firm, Ketchum & Cheatum. Yes, there was such a firm in Charleston, S. C., still more singular, they were, I. Ketchum, U. Cheatum, real names, too. My father d with them, and they were honest, too.

A. B. F., Cleveland, O. Can you tell me, thro THE MAIL-BAG, something about "Lake-dw ings" and the "Lake-dwellers"? Who w they, and where were their houses built?

Herodotus tells of a Thracian tri living about 520 B. C., and gives an count of their dwellings, built in a sm mountain lake in Rumelia. The cust of constructing these habitations has co down to the present day. The fishern of Lake Prasias, near Salonica, still inh it wooden cottages built over the wat and in the East Indies the practice building lake settlements is common. Switzerland, lake-dwellings came to lig during the winter months of 1853-54, wh the water of the lakes fell much below i ordinary level. The main platform these dwellings is made of round timbe covered with a bed of mud, the walls a sides of interlaced branches, the interstic filled with moss and daubed with cla The huts were probably thatched, and t parts used as dormitories strewn w straw.

A Millionaire's Simple Wedding

The wedding of Mr. Marshall Field and Mrs. Delia Spencer Caton, which was celebrated at St. Margaret's, Westminster, England, recently, was a marvel of simplicity, in great contrast to the pomp and grandeur that characterize the modern wedding ceremony in high life. Guests and spectators who anticipated a brilliant scene and striking ceremonies, including gilded rice and diamond-studded slippers to be thrown after the happy couple, were grievously disappointed. There were present in the church only a few very intimate friends of the bride and groom. These included the American Ambassador and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, the former of whom signed the marriage-register. Mr. Marshall Field has had a most remarkable career. Rising from the humble station of a farmer's boy, he eventually became partner with Mr. L. Leiter, the great Chicago merchant and father of Lady Curzon, Vice-reine of India. Later, Mr. Field bought the whole interest in the business. He is now in his seventieth year.

A LIGHT IN HEATHEN BURMA

By Miss Susan E. Haswell, of Moulmein

In the great field of Christian activity in Burma, workers of all denominations are giving the best that is in them in order that the seed sown by Adoniram Judson, the pioneer missionary, may bear a larger harvest with each succeeding year. A number of the missionaries are endeavoring to establish their stations on a partly self-supporting basis. Where agriculture has been taken as the means of employing converts and training them for ves of usefulness, they have become already successful, in a measure We believe that in this way many of the knotty problems that confront the workers here may be solved.

I have been a missionary in the City of Moulmein, and other parts of the Amherst District, in Burma, for nearly forty-one years, having sailed from Boston to join my missionary parents in October, 1864. Fourteen years were spent in Moulmein, in establishing school work and starting a medical mission. During this period there were founded a boarding and day school for Burmese boys, still in a flourishing condition; the same for Burmese girls, which now includes an English department, a normal department, and a free kindergarten; a boarding and day school for Eurasian girls, now including normal training (carried on through affiliation with the government normal school). This also has a kindergarten.

A Teacher

In 1880, Dr. Ellen Mitchell was appointed superintendent of the medical mission, and for twenty years was a blessing to the bodies and souls of those to whom she ministered, among the many races represented in Moulmein. Since Dr. Mitchell's death, in 1900, the medical mission has ceased to exist; but there is pressing need of its being resumed, though on somewhat different lines. There are now several physicians residing in Moulmein, and general medical work is not so much required of medical missionaries as formerly. A maternity hospital and training school for nurses is needed more sorely than can be imagined by those in civilized lands. The appalling suffering inflicted upon the poor women of this land, by the inhuman methods of treatment, frequently result in death.

A Native Burmese Christian Pastor and His Family

A building well adapted for the purpose of a maternity hospital and training school is now for sale in Moulmein, for $4,000. It has a small plot of land, with flower garden and trees. There is a good well, servants' quarters, stables, etc. It is in a central position, and near the mission schools. If some one would contribute the funds for the purchase of this building, a furnishing grant, and grant-in-aid, for the support of twenty-five beds, could be obtained from the "Countess of Dufferin Fund." A local committee would be formed, and some missionary society would be asked to appoint a lady physician, unless, indeed, they would assume the full control. Fees and local contributions would cover all expenses, beyond those provided for by the grants from the Dufferin Fund. Lady Curzon has already sent me about $150 for this work. Dr. Simpson, of Edinburgh, has also given me a donation of about $20. It is intended that pupils from mission schools, and especially those from the industrial mission, shall have the preference in being received for training. Graduates will be sent two and two to jungle villages, where they can have a Christian home, and some oversight from the missionary in whose district the villages lie. After two years, the nurses will be permitted to locate and work wherever they wish.

In 1881, I entered upon evangelistic work, having charge of an important out-station and district, traveling from village to village during the dry season with native preachers. The more intimate knowledge of the people thus gained, made me feel greatly the need of an asylum for lepers, a school for the blind, and an industrial mission for native Christians and for orphan and destitute children. I at once began to pray and work for them. In 1898, the leper asylum was an accomplished fact. The buildings stand in a ten-acre fruit garden. Everything possible has been done to make the poor inmates comfortable and happy.

In 1900, Dr. Mitchell, who sympathized and co-operated with me in all my efforts, both for the lepers and the blind, succeeded, when on her dying bed, in securing government recognition and assistance for the latter. A technical school for the blind was soon established. Both the leper asylum and the blind school are giving to the people of this land practical proof of the love of God in Christ.

The industrial mission proper, did not begin to bud and blossom till about eighteen months ago, when a young Swede, Mr. Carl Tornblad, came to my assistance. Recently flood and fire have caused heavy loss. We have seventy acres of land, suited to various purposes. Clay beds of the best quality exist. There is a salt farm of seven acres, seven acres of rice land, six acres of pasture, and fifty acres suited to the cultivation of sesamum or oil seed.

The school grounds are on a promontory jutting out into the sea. Here we have 120 acres. Since November last we have cleared and planted about eighteen, and put up or bought five temporary buildings. There are four large wells on the land, three of which never fail. The soil is exceedingly fertile, and we have seven acres planted with Pernambuco cotton.

The "Silent Places"

TEXT: I. Samuel 3:9:
"Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth"

HOW the mighty men and women of the world found their callings in life would make very interesting reading. Sometimes a genius, like Mozart, is born. From his cradle, his parents knew what vocation this child would pursue. At three years of age, with his little chubby fingers, he could make the piano speak with the touch of a master. At five years he appeared in public at the University of Salzburg. At six, with his little sister Marianne, he was traveling about Europe on a concert tour, the pet of kings and queens, and the wonder and astonishment of the musical world. But though Wolfgang Mozart was born to music, most of our great men and women live years, and years, and years before they recognize their right spheres in life. Some of them try four or five different lines of work before they place their feet upon the lowest steps, to mount their thrones of power. Some, like Odysseus, the Homeric hero of the Trojan war, had to be bound hand and foot to the masts of duty, else they would have leaped overboard, and followed the false wooing of the siren's song.

Seeking a Vocation

George Washington did not wish to be a soldier, but a sailor. A British man-of-war came to Chesapeake Bay when he was a young man. He wanted to enlist. A midshipman's commission was obtained for him by his elder brother Lawrence. His trunk was already packed and placed on board ship. But his widowed mother could not bear to let her "baby" boy leave her side. For her sake he turned his back upon the quarter-deck of a British warship, and thereby paved his way for the wonderful career which has made his name the most famous in American history. Oliver Cromwell wanted to emigrate to America. He and his family were down at the dock with their tickets in their pockets, and had their berths engaged, when a royal command forbade him leaving the king's country. Frederick W. Robertson came from a long ancestral line of British officers. He wanted to be a soldier. Indeed, for a time he did wear the soldier's uniform; but physical infirmity made him forego camp life. He entered Edinburgh University. When he became pastor of Trinity Chapel at Brighton, he found his right position, which mightily influenced his own generation, and will also influence the English speaking race for all time. Thus, many of our most famous men and women have been compelled to grope and struggle along, sometimes for years, for their right vocations in life, just the same as you and I have done in the past, or may be now doing in the present. Where there is one Mozart who was born a child genius, there are a thousand Frederick W. Robertsons, whose intellect and material life have developed gradually. First came the seed, then the sprout, then the blossom, and then the luscious fruit.

Voices of the Silence

The first calls of the temporal life, as a rule, fall upon unheeding ears. The first calls of the spiritual life, in the same way, usually fall upon unheeding ears. When God first called to Samuel in the midnight hour, "Samuel, Samuel," the lad leaped up, and ran to the old priest, Eli, supposing that it was he who called him, and said, "Here am I." Then Eli answered: "My son, I have not called thee. Go back to bed." Again Samuel heard God's voice, and again he mistook it for a human voice. "Samuel, Samuel." "What is it, Eli?" asked the boy. "Here I am. I am always ready to wait upon thee." Again the old man answered: "My son, I have not called thee." Then a third time God called, and old Eli said to Samuel: "My son, it is not I calling thee, but God. When God calls to thee again, do not run to me, but answer: 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.'" Thus young Samuel was taught to listen to the voice of the Lord in the midnight hour. Thus I would beg you to heed God's voice when he speaks to you in the "Silent Places" of life. God generally calls us to our higher spiritual life in the "Silent Places," as he called Samuel to become the prophet of Israel in the stillness of the midnight darkness.

Where are these "Silent Places" in which you and I can hear the voice of the Lord? In the first place, I would state that God calls us in the hours of darkness. He calls to us as he called Samuel after the first sleep of the night is over, and we suddenly awake and feel that some one is very near to us and speaking. We cannot see him, but we feel him and hear him. We feel his presence and hear him just the same as we used to recognize our mother's hand and her kiss and her "Good-night, my boy," when we were children, and she would come and take a last look at us to see that we were all right, before going to bed.

The Hour of Death

Perhaps the reason why God is able to speak to us so clearly in the early hours of the morning can be explained upon natural grounds. Have you never noticed the fact that most of our friends die about two or three o'clock in the morning? As Solomon beautifully symbolized it: When was the silver cord loosed, or the golden bowl broken, or the pitcher broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern, when your dear ones were translated? Your brother, how did he go? Your mother said to the nurse, "Now, nurse, I think John is better to-night. But if you need me, just give a rap upon the floor and I will come up." It seemed that you were asleep only a little while when a commotion in the house made you leap out of bed. You rushed to your brother's room. You saw the breathing becoming heavier and heavier. At last the doctor said, "He is gone." You looked at the clock and you heard it striking, "One, two, three." When did your mother die? At noon? In the evening twilight, when the flush of the setting sun was slowly fading away and its ball of fire was sinking behind the western hills? Oh, no. You had been awake all night worrying about her. The last relapse came about two o'clock in the morning. Her life went out with the crowing of the cock and with the first glimpse of the dawn. The reason why most people die in the early hours of the morning is because the sun has long been very far away from us. At that time there is less vitality in the air. Then our physical hold on earthly life is weakest. So, my friends, as earth grips us less about two or three o'clock in the morning, let the Holy Spirit grip us closer to Christ. Let these few minutes in the early morning be to us sacred moments for communion with God.

Nature's "Silent Places"

But the voice of the Lord is heard in the daylight, as well as in the darkness. When we are standing upon our feet, as well as when we are lying upon our backs; when we are tramping over the hillsides, or sitting by the seashore, or watching the mad rush of the whirlpool rapids of Niagara Falls, or when we are in the presence of the pyrotechnics of a thunder-storm; or when we watch a bird build her nest, or the wild-flower lift up its cheeks to be kissed by the sunbeams in mountain glen; or when we hear the rippling of the brook leaping over the rocks to find a bathing pool in which the feathered songsters can take their morning bath. And of all places where the voice of the Lord can be heard distinctly speaking to us, I believe that voice can best be heard in the "Silent Places" of nature, far away from the habitations of man. If a human being cannot hear the voice of the Lord in the woods and on the boundless prairies, or from the deck of a steamer or sailing ship cutting the waters of the mighty deep, then I believe it is almost impossible for him to hear the divine voice speaking under cathedral tower or from pulpit in the village kirk. Yet some people make a boast that for them the lips of nature are absolutely dumb. In it they can neither hear the love of man nor the love of God calling them to the better, and the nobler, and the higher life.

If man is deaf to the voice of God calling to him in the "Silent Places" of nature, he is deaf to some of the pleadings of the divine love. For my own part, I never see the wild flowers growing either in valley or upon mountain height, but they call to me: "Friend, consider the lilies of the fields. Christ is weaving for me my garments. Shall he not clothe his human children, oh ye of little faith?" I never see a mother-bird caring for her young but she calls to me: "I am a sparrow. God feeds me. God will feed you." I never stand before a great natural wonder, like Kilauea, or Yosem , or Gothard Pass, but above it, and underneath it, a all around it, myriads of voices are calling from "Silent Places" of nature as the voice of the Lord cal to Moses out of the burning bush, "Take thy shoes from thy feet, for this is holy ground. Thou art now the presence of thy Maker. I am God. Listen to and obey me. I am God, who made all things, omnipotent, and omniscient, and omnipresent G Canst thou not trust Him who holds the sea in the pa of his hand, who can look upon the earth and make tremble, who can touch the hills with his finger a make them smoke?"

The care and the protection of a divine Father's lo always speak to me in the "Silent Places" of natu Many years ago the voices of nature sounded for their divine lessons in one mighty chorus. I stood up Observation Point and looked off upon the wonder Grand Canyon of Yellowstone Park. It is one of t most marvelous places of the world. There before y is a valley smooth as the floor of a great cathedral, y large enough to gather into it one of the nations of t world. From each side of this floor rise two precipito basaltic walls over a thousand feet in height, scarr and seamed with battling down which often detached rocks thunder, dulling t crash of artillery. Here the "Rock of Ages," of riche blood-red tinge, glitters and sparkles in the eveni twilight. From yonder cliff a fortress seems to loo on whose watch-tower keen-eyed eagles have perch their eyries, from which ever and anon one rises, an flying in graceful circles, with sweep of eye reconnoitr the land. Yonder soar up Moran and Bierstadt Point from whose heights those artists painted their famo pictures, varied in every hue and capped with corone of green foliage. There the river, with serpentine ar graceful windings, slowly crawls along to empty h waters into the sea. Then suddenly, like a mad hors she rears herself and takes the bit into her teeth. Wit foaming flank and wild roar, she dashes and makes or awful leap over the dizzy heights of Yellowstone Fall There, breaking into millions of pearls, she hides herse behind a curtain of white, at the foot of which glister a rainbow, a fitting passementerie for the robe of a angel. And so perfect there is the symmetry of th horizon, that you cannot tell whether the waters wer lost behind curtains of earthly mist or curtains of heav enly cloud.

A scene stupendous, canopied by arch of heaven an lit by light of sun! No one spoke. It seemed a though the angel who had once stood at the gate o Paradise had again unsheathed the sword of fire an cut a deep gash into old mother earth, deep enough t take out her very heart. As we listened to the voice o God calling out of the silence of Yellowstone Park, s you may hear the divine voice whenever you go fort to the country hills. You may hear his voice by th moaning sea, in the voices of the woods, and in th calm, quiet, overpowering simplicity of the blue sky.

The Silence of Sorrow

One of the "Silent Places" in which we can hear the voice of God speaking to us, is in the hushed home, after the undertaker has come and robbed us of the father or mother or wife or husband or prattling child. How still it is! The friends who attended the funeral are all gone. Still, still—everything is still. There was a time when we used to talk about our nerves. We would say: "The doctors tell me I must be quiet." But God knows it is quiet enough now. Why, the old home is so still that there is not the echo of even one pair of romping feet. It is so still that you can hear your heart thump and pound in anguish under your flesh. Oh, God, how still it is! Still, still, appallingly still. But, my friends, though the bereft home is so still, if you listen carefully in its silence I think you can hear the voice of God speaking.

But, strange to say, I find the "Silent Places" where we should hear God's voice, in the busy noise and bustle and hum of a great city. I find them amid the clanging of the electric cars. I find them in the rumble of the big factories. I find them amid the hilarities of cial gatherings, as well as in the silence of the death amber. These awful "Silent Places" should speak to us -day in God's name. They should rouse us to the unlfilled opportunities of Christian work as never before. t me illustrate my thought by a simple experience of y life, which shows how a man can be in the world and t not of it. Many years ago, when a college student, had an opportunity to deliver a few lectures during y Thanksgiving vacation in old New England. other did not want me to go, but I wished to make a ginning in the practice of public speaking as soon as ssible. I left my Brooklyn home with a happy heart. it when Thanksgiving Eve drew near, I became more d more homesick. Oh, how homesick I was! That ening I was in Boston. I walked up and down the eets without a friend. I stood in the depot, and saw e happy fathers, with their big bundles on their arms, ading for home. To-morrow was Thanksgiving. I w the young married folks, with smile and good cheer king the grandchildren back to the old homestead. I w even some who were dressed in black, smiling for e sake of others. But though there was laughter and frolic and family gatherings all around me, I was alone. I was in a "Silent Place." No one cared for me. No one in all that big city spoke to me except on business. I was in a "Silent Place." As my mind runs back those twenty years, I say to myself and to you: "How many of us are spiritually living in 'Silent Places'?"

Are your neighbors part of you? Do they gratefully watch you? When you go through the woods not one leaf turns towards you unless you make it turn. Why? The leaves know you not. When you go through the streets of a great city you meet men; you meet hundreds of men; you meet thousands of men. Do they spiritually see you? Are you spiritually in the city and yet not part of it? How many of the men you pass in daily life look up at you with a smile and say, "You helped me to Christ?" "You extended to me a saving hand when I was struggling in the quicksands of a great temptation." "By the noble work of your life, you have been a Christian example which has inspired me to lead a Christian life." How many of all the men and women you have known in this city life can speak thus to you? One? Ten? One hundred? A thousand? Are you spiritually to your friends what I was in Boston many years ago? Are you in one of the "Silent Places?"

Then, my brother, if you have neglected the spiritual opportunities of life for the great outside world, how have you dealt with those of your own home? Did you never realize that a husband and wife could live side by side for years and never know each other in the deeper and in the holier sense? Did you never realize that there can be great "Silent Places" between brothers and sisters, between parents and children, between children and parents? "Silent Places" there are in which people's souls do not commingle and know each other in holy fellowship. My God! can it be that there are spiritual "Silent Places" between us and the lives of our dear ones? Can it be that there is any mother here who has not talked with her children about Christ? Is there any wife here who has not talked to her husband about Christ? Are there any men or women here who have spiritual "Silent Places" in which God is calling them to go and work in his vineyard? Will you go and labor for him?

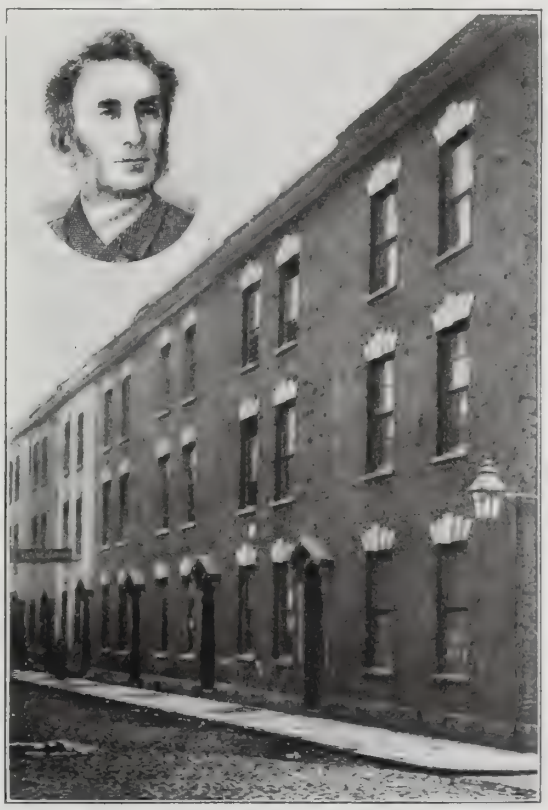
GEORGE MULLER'S CENTENNIAL

By Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D.D.

THERE are some anniversaries that are so intimately linked with the history of mankind, that it seems positively wrong not to observe them in some fitting manner. Such is the ntenary of the birth of George Muller, so well known connection with the famous orphanage work in istol, England. He was born on the 27th of Sepmber, 1805. He lived to enter his ninety-third year, ing on the 10th of March, 1898. Up to the last, he tained both his physical and mental faculties to a markable degree.

He has been known mainly as the founder of one of e largest orphanage institutions in the world. Five ge buildings stand on Ashley Down in Bristol, from nich 1,200 windows look out upon the Down, and, at ie time, he has had in these buildings as many as 2,200 phans with their helpers—an immense family to feed, othe, lodge, and educate. This work has been carried ever since 1836, without ever an appeal to any human ing for aid. Everything is done by prayer, and direct peal to the Father of the fatherless. During all this ne, there has never been a lack of anything, though at nes faith has been sorely tried. I asked Mr. Muller, ortly before his death, whether the orphans had ever en compelled to go without any meal, and he swered: "Never; nor has a meal ever been postoned for lack of supplies, except on two occasions, d then only for a half hour." He had remarkable wer to prevail with God in prayer. On more than ie occasion, even the wind, and storm, and temperare were modified in accordance with his request, as pecially on one occasion, when the heating apparatus Number Three gave out, and it was necessary to put a new boiler. The weather began to be very cold d threatening, and there were no other means of arming the building. He besought God to change the ind, until the heating apparatus was replaced, and his ayer was literally fulfilled. There were also many stances when funds were supplied in emergencies at ie exact time, and in the exact sum needed, so that ie interposition of God became absolutely unqestioned. This orphanage work, owever, was only one of five branches of what is known as "The Scriptural nowledge Institution at Home and Abroad." This institution was for the purpose f planting Christian chools in other a'nds, distributing ibles, and dissemiating religious litrature in other anguages, and aintaining foreign issionaries in their ork; so that the rphanage work, nportant as it is, as only one of the anches of a great ife activity. Upards of $7,000,000 assed through Mr. Iuller's hands in the ourse of about sixty ears, which was pplied to the varius forms of benelences which his ork represented. So great was his self-denial and frugality that he began with shilling, and at his death his entire estate could be valued at no more than about 800, including clothing, furniture, and library.

George Muller



The First of Muller's Orphan Homes

Mr. Muller's work was largely inspired by the example of Mr. Francke, in Halle, Germany, who, about 150 years before this, laid the foundations of a similar orphanage work in that city, twenty-five years afterwards housing and feeding about 1,800 orphans and helpers. From this work, which Mr. Muller had witnessed when a student in the University of Halle, he undoubtedly took his main conception of his own life service.

The work which was thus begun about seventy years ago, still goes forward under the superintendence of Mr. G. F. Bergin and Mr. F. S. Arnot (of Garenganze fame). We have supplied to our readers some important and original photographs of the buildings connected with this work; for example, the house in which Mr. Muller lived for upwards of thirty years, and specimens of the buildings which he constructed on Ashley Down. Those who are specially interested in this work in Bristol, England, have been preparing to celebrate his one hundredth anniversary by issuing a condensed autobiography, compiled from his own journals, which will be published in a cheap form intended for world-wide circulation. Mr. Muller's great life-work, as he conceived it, was to rear a monument to the living God as a present helper and the hearer of prayer. To this everything was subordinate, and, for this reason, many of his minor methods were pursued steadfastly to the end. He would not allow an appeal to be made for the work, however great the crisis, nor would he allow mention of such needs to be made by his own helpers to any outside parties; not because either of these methods was wrong in itself, but because they might impair the strength and value of the testimony to a prayer-hearing God. He wished to demonstrate that it is perfectly safe, in working for God, to have dealings solely with him, and this testimony is his true memorial. No monument of bronze or marble could be half as mighty a witness to his worth as the work which he successfully began and which still goes forward, like Mr. Francke's orphan work in Halle, even after the founders have passed away.

[In connection with the foregoing facts, our readers may be glad to know the present condition of the institution, which, since Mr. Muller's death, has been conducted on the same principles of absolute reliance upon God for support. There are now in the Orphanages 1,922 children. Of these 308 were received during the past year. The number who left the institution at the end of their period of training was 236. There are, therefore, now seventy-two more children to be fed, clothed and educated, than there were at this time last year. It is gratifying to learn that during the year forty-seven children—twenty-six girls and twenty-one boys—made public profession of faith. The donations received during the year from the public amounted to $109,840. The expenses of feeding, clothing and educating the children were $130,945. Thus reducing the balance in hand by $21,105.—Ed.]

Two Native Evangelists

Missionary House at Moulmein

Those whom I am especially desirous of helping through the industrial mission are orphan and destitute children, including the untainted children of leprous families, and the children of grave-diggers. The latter class regard themselves as under a curse and bound to live nowhere but in or near the Buddhist graveyards, and to do no work aside from digging graves. They bear the title of "Governors of the Dead," and being regarded as such by the natives, no one resents what may be done by them to their subjects, the dead. The women and children haunt the bazaars and other public places, begging. The men dig graves, build funeral pyres, and bury or burn the dead. Generation after generation has been born into this ghoulish life and passed on into eternity, and as yet no effort has been made to save them, beyond an occasional visit to their settlements to proclaim the Gospel.

The remark of an old man of this class, "It is too late for us! Our habits are fixed, and we cannot change; but if sister could save the children it would be so good," was what first led me to pray and work for the establishment of an industrial mission. Children of this class cannot be received until we can have dormitories and eating places especially for them; otherwise we should not get other pupils.

Orphans may be divided into three classes. First, orphans in fact; second, those who have lost one parent by death; and third, those whose parents have separated—a most common thing in this land. The two last classes are as truly orphaned as the first. Harsh treatment drives the children away, and they drift from one relative to another; no one really responsible for them, and they accountable to no one, till they become lawless and fall an easy prey to evil-doers. I now have in my care ten children, one of them, a boy who wished to become a teacher, and was sent to the Rangoon Baptist College. In eighteen months more he will have passed the university entrance examination, and have secured the highest vernacular normal certificates, and will then return to take charge of the vernacular department of the school on Alabama Plantation, as we call our place. Two of the children are girls from a leprous family. I was to have taken a cousin of theirs also, but leprosy manifested itself, and it was my sad privilege to take her to the asylum, where she is content and happy. Ten days after she was admitted to the asylum, her grand-aunt, who had sheltered her from the time her mother died and her father abandoned his three children, died suddenly; and but for the asylum the poor girl would to-day be a homeless beggar.

We aim to bring up most of the boys as agriculturalists, but they will receive training in other lines, such as caning chairs, carpentry, blacksmithing, charcoal burning, etc. The girls will be trained in all kinds of domestic work, gardening, poultry raising, bee culture, weaving and spinning. Those boys and girls who show special aptitude for study, will be sent to higher grade mission schools when they are ready.

Funds are urgently required for permanent buildings, towards which we already have considerable material. Also for the purchase of more cattle, patent spinning and winding machines and looms, which are offered to us at very low prices, and for the purchase of unhusked rice, and some agricultural instruments.

If we can receive this help I do not think that we shall ever have to make another appeal to the Christian public. This year we could not hire labor, and consequently could not cultivate our rice fields. Next year, please God, we shall raise our own rice, the Christian Karens doing the work. Donors should state clearly to which branch of the work they wish their contributions applied, whether to the purchase of the building for the Maternity Hospital and Training School, or directly to the Industrial Mission. Our nearest post-office is in Amherst, thirty-five miles north, and half-way between us and Moulmein. Ankai is the nearest village to the plantation, and our mails are brought to it twice a week by mail-runners. Bills of exchange, money orders and letters can be addressed as follows, "Via Brindisi, Miss Haswell, Alabama Plantation, Ankai, via Moulmein and Amherst, Lower Burma, India."

The Canadian Exhibit at Liege

PROBABLY no country in the world is making such energetic efforts as Canada to attract to her domains the capital and labor of all countries. No Exposition is held without the visitor seeing in some part of the grounds a stately building, on whose front appear the words, "Canada."

At the great Exposition now being held at Liege, in Belgium, the Dominion has a building and exhibit of her resources that draws large crowds of interested visitors. The building is of Ionic style, with five towers, the central one rising to a height of one hundred and twenty feet. The visitor, after passing beneath the imposing portal, finds himself in a hall nearly two hundred feet long and over a hundred wide. Round the hall runs a wide gallery, the pillars of which are decorated in a way to cause the hard working and poorly paid agriculturist of Europe to stand petrified with amazement. Grasses and cereals, and cans of Canadian products are grouped about the posts, while the bases rest upon bays composed of wheat of such a growth as has appeared only to a European farmer in his dreams.

Main Hall of the Canadian Exhibit in the Liege Exposition

Underneath the gallery are large alcoves. Those on the left are for the cereals. Large blackboards give, in many languages, the amount raised in the different provinces. The alcoves are backed with pictures in oils of farm life in the Dominion. To insure absolute accuracy, they were painted from photographs by famous Canadian artists. They are lit by electric lamps and framed with native grasses. Beneath each picture is an explanation of the painting, with interesting details of a farmer's life in the district represented.

In the Department of Forestry there is shown every product of native wood, from flooring to the finest pulp and tissue papers. The Dominion, it is here stated, can supply the world with paper for two hundred years, and that the supply will be furnished by two million square miles of forests. Enormous peaches, pears and apples show the great resources of the country as a fruit-growing region. Canada sends large quantities of fruit to Great Britain and the Continent, and with increased transportation facilities the amount exported will be greatly increased. An enormous maple leaf, composed of tobacco plants, divides interest with an exhibit from the Canadian vineyards. So varied, in fact, is this part of the display, that the Belgian farmers shake their heads as if they doubted that so many good things could come from one land.

The Department of Minerals is, in its way, no less interesting. There are small mountains of copper and nickel. From Sudbury, Ontario, eight million pounds' worth has been dug in the last decade. There are also rocky lumps of asbestos, crowned with a statement that Canada furnished ninety per cent. of the world's output. There are exhibits of soapstone, aluminum, iron, lead, silver and cobalt. To enumerate them all would be like giving the index of a handbook on geology. At one side is a beautiful little turret, built of tinted alabaster. Nearby are seen specimens of gold from the Yukon.

In connection with the exhibit is an emigration bureau, whose active and efficient officers see that no one leaves the building without receiving some literature in regard to the Dominion. The results of this work are already seen in the increased steamship bookings for Montreal. Canada is attracting at the present time the very best class of foreign emigrants. A large number of people, especially farmers, from our own country, have recently made their home in the great Northwest, where a man is lost in his own fields, and the acres of wheat and corn seem as boundless as the sea.

The Gateway of all Nations

BY JACOB A. RIIS

MY particular company in the Christian army is the Episcopal. I shall not go into the reasons that led me thither, after a somewhat varied experience of other folds. They were good ad weighty reasons, and I am there to stay. But I on that for years I was not exactly what you would c a l l c o m f o r t a b l e. I should not have thought that I would have cared so much. I had always said when theological differences cropped out, that I did not much care what regimental badge a man wore so long as he marched under the flag and was enlisted for the war. But there were things that worried me for all that. Now it was a candle, and then a robe, or a procession, or bowing of heads—h u s k s altogether, it s med to me, and obstructions instead of helps to wors p. So I reasoned, and what with one thing and nother, quite without suspecting it, I got myself rked round, I fear, into the attitude of the Pharisee vo thanked God he was not like this sinner. I was ntally patting myself upon the back, a the only fellow who was after the t ng in the barrel, the others were s enely content with the staves; unt one day the story of little Abra- h n Goldstein struck down in my soul a gave me my bearings.

A Young Jewish Mother

Abraham was eleven, and the first- b n of a poor Jew who lived in a slum t ement and pressed pants for the s ater. The Goldsteins were ortho- d x, and their burning ambition was t t their son should one day be a r bi, a teacher of his people. To t s end all their labor, all their sav- i and self-denial. Starvation had n terrors for them, if only all went w ll with Abraham. And from the l le pale-faced lad of gravity beyond h years, came no dissenting note, till o e day he petrified the tenement by a nouncing calmly that he would not b a rabbi when he was grown, but a t lor like his father.

When they got over the shock, t y reasoned and raged by turns, and b h having failed, bethought them- s ves of the Settlement, as a likely p ce where such a notion might have g into his head. To it came father Goldstein with g evous complaint. The headworker was nonplussed. S e could not explain, but she would try to find out. A d she took Abraham in hand kindly, and asked him w at was the matter. Silent at first, in the end the l opened his heart to her, and this was the reason h gave why he would not be a rabbi:

"Because," said he, "I do not think I could ever find w rds beautiful enough to speak to God in."

To me, who heard, it came as in a flash that I was t Pharisee, not they; that if that was what it all m ant, if their candles, vestments, processions and p nted prayers were so many human efforts to find w ys and words beautiful enough to speak to God in—if they were their ways, for me to object were presumption indeed. And though I shall never heartily like them, I expect, because they do not happen to be my way, I shall say no word against them as long as I live. That was how the little orthodox Jew taught me my plain Christian duty.

I set it down here as introductory to what I have to say on the subject of immigration, though it is only a personal matter. My views have other foundation. They are briefly that we cannot have too much of the right kind, and, as the President aptly put it, the wrong kind we do not want at all. As the wrong kind I identify those who come here to do wrong. The man who comes here to better himself, I would accept without question, other than "is he personally fit?" For it is certain that in bettering himself, he will do us a good turn too. Whether he brings five dollars or fifty dollars is of little account. Experience has taught me that he generally spends it, especially if he be a young fellow with the desire of his years to see life, before he goes to work to earn more. The immigrants of last year brought over, according to the record on Ellis Island, some twenty millions of dollars; but if they brought us nothing else, we could not be too quick in shutting the gate.

Somewhere I have told of the Italian family I found

side-tracked at the Barge Office; three, four lusty young men and women surrounding an old grandfather as if with a wall of defence. The family had been held up because of him. "Too old to work," said the inspector and shook his head. The four leaped to their feet and bared their brawny arms.

"Are we not young enough and strong enough to work for him?" they cried.

Shut the gate, by all means, against the vicious and the vile, and shut it over on the other side before they start. Shut it against such a colony as I found burrowing once in a Mulberry Street tenement, Neapolitan brigands, who held the Black Hand over their countrymen and lived on blackmailing here, as they had done over there. When the police got their record from their home, it turned out that every one of them—there were ten or a dozen, if I remember right—had been punished from three or four to eighteen times for every crime short of actual murder, from "maiming" to kidnapping. Shut it against them and hold it hard. It ought not to be such a difficult thing to do, for there are not nearly as many of them as we are sometimes told. As for the rest, if they do look a little worn, right from the steerage, they are not always the "ignorant vicious horde" we hear of. There was a heap of common sense in the retort of one of the steamship managers, the other day, to the charge that his company and the others foisted immigrants upon us by the thousand for their own profit.

"The United States' Mail," he said, "is the real immigration agent. It scatters broadcast throughout all Europe the story of the contrast between here and there. Every man who writes home to the old land tells it. And let us be glad. For we get in return the men who can appreciate that difference, who are ambitious to do better and who are not afraid. They come with courage and with strength, and those are the real assets we want."

I have lived for many summers at the gateway through which the stream pours all the days in the year, and where so much of it halts because of our failure to provide for the distribution of it to the fields where work and wages wait for every comer. Necessarily in New York one sees the worst of it, because of the congestion and the want consequent upon it. The combination makes the "problem" which vaguely frightens so many people. And yet right here I am willing to take my stand with the Jew, the Italian, the Bohemian, the Hungarian—I mention purposely the races to which objection is made now-a-days—as material for citizenship every bit as good as that which is to the manner born, seek it where you please. I say it advisedly, because I know; and further, I am not so sure that it is not better material than some of the native. A good many of us have grown old with the idea of political freedom till we have forgotten that the Republic is not a cow to be milked for privilege and graft. Where our own have been following strange gods, from the Civil War to the silver heresy, you will find that the naturalized citizenship has stood fairly in a body for the right, for the Union, for an honest dollar. And the reason is not far to seek: they came here for the square deal, and they will fight for it if need be. They never had it over there. The Jew had no flag to love. Whatever the color of the one he lived under, to him it did not mean protection, but persecution, when prejudices were aroused that eyed him askance as an alien ever. Is it a wonder that he embraces ours with the ardor of a first great love? For he does.

We turn up our noses at the Italian because he takes the lowest job, and because of the affection for the mother-land that will not let him forget, and that makes him herd in the tenements with the men from the same village of the old patron saint they worshiped together. Perhaps our attitude toward him has something to do with that. We turn him back upon his own for sympathy,

A Powerful Ally

IN the very able article from the pen of United States Senator Shelby M. Cullom (part of which we are permitted to reproduce elsewhere, through the courtesy of Editor Harvey, of the North American Review), there is a strong appeal to conservative public opinion concerning the "Mormon Menace." Senator Cullom is the "father of anti-Mormon legislation," having drawn up the first bill of that character ever presented to a legislature, and he possesses an intimate knowledge of the subject which enables him to speak with authority.

In common with the readers of this journal, and with the great army of American women who are now agitating the question, Senator Cullom holds that the real menace to the nation is not from the Mormon people of Utah and other States, nor from their creed, but from the law-breaking and law-defying Mormon hierarchy, which has admittedly violated "the laws of God and man," and proved faithless to its pledge to abandon the teaching and practice of polygamy. It is significant, too, that the Illinois Senator urges as the only remedy for the existing condition of affairs, the same measure that has been consistently advocated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, viz.: A Constitutional Amendment by Congress, making the law against polygamy effective throughout the country and providing for its enforcement.

But there is a further menace to our nation to which the distinguished Senator calls attention. He writes:

> If the hierarchy of the Mormon Church exists as it once existed; if it penetrates, as it once penetrated, into the affairs of citizenship; if it dictates, as it once dictated, courses of conduct at variance with the laws of the land under whose flag it claims protection and privilege—then it is a menace, and it is high time that we demanded reformation.

We submit that the actual existence of these conditions has been fully proved by the proceedings before the Senate Committee. 1. Polygamy exists, is winked at by the Mormon leaders and practiced by them individually, as they have unblushingly confessed. 2. The hierarchy domínates a portion of our territory, setting aside all the rights of citizenship and implanting upon free American soil a dictatorship—a form and principle of government wholly alien to our own; a little despotism within the Republic.

We welcome the accession to the cause of national righteousness of so able and influential an ally as the Illinois Senator. His arraignment of Mormonism deserves to be read everywhere, and should be scattered broadcast by the Women's Executive Committee throughout the homes of our land. Its clear and logical conclusions furnish the strongest argument yet adduced in support of the women's demand for the removal of the polygamous Mormon hierarchy's representative from his seat in the United States Senate.

Faith and Reason

RECENT discussions in the daily press, on the subject of faith and reason, appear to represent the two as being diametrically opposed. The opinion seems to prevail that man is forced to accept one or the other as his guide. The idea is wholly mischievous, because it would place the Christian in the attitude of closing his eyes to facts and clinging to theories, which are opposed to facts. Reason and faith ought never to be placed in contrast. Faith is never unreasonable. It is simply a guide through the country that reason does not reach. When reason lays down her compass and admits she can go no farther, she leaves us in the dark as to things of the most intense import to our spiritual existence. We have to go on in our thought, and eventually in actual experience, into a region about which our present knowledge gives us no light. We are altogether dependent then on revelation, and it is only as we exercise faith in that revelation that we have any sure ground for our steps. But even there, we are not asked to believe anything that our reason rejects. Perhaps it would be impossible to put spiritual truth in the form of a syllogism. But faith invites us to pass beyond the school of syllogism into a higher region in which there are other methods of learning.

There is a basis, too, in reason for using our faith. Reason cannot begin her processes without faith. Professor Huxley himself admitted that there was no hope of teaching science to any student who refused to exercise faith. He must, for example, believe in the universal operation of physical law, and this could not be proved. The student is obliged also to believe things that he cannot understand. The phenomena of electricity are mysteries still; but we know what they are, though we cannot explain them. Reason has need of faith to enable her to help us, and there is no divorce between them when faith takes the lead. They go hand in hand still, and there is no conflict, such as is suggested, between them.

There is much of pride and self-confidence in this attempt to put reason and faith in contrast. Our heavenly Father gently takes his children by the hand, and would lead them into spiritual truth. Is it right that we should demand that every revelation should be proved to the satisfaction of our finite reason? If the child in school took that course, what would he learn? It is not unreasonable to suppose that other faculties, other powers, will be given to us, when the soul is separated from the body, by which spiritual truths will become clear to us. Let us wait in patience the fuller revelation, accepting in faith the clues given to us, by which we may guide our lives. Jesus said that faith would remove mountains. We have never put it fully to the test; but this we do know, that wherever it has been exercised in simplicity, it has been honored and has justified the trust. We have seen how it has changed character, and how, as in the case of George Muller, it has provided the means of philanthropic service. There is much more that it may do, if we only use it more. They who would have us discard it and live by the light of reason only, would deprive us of the God-given power that is the mightiest force in life.

The Harvest

ONE more beautiful summer has ended; the warm, rich tints of autumn are now making glorious the hills; harvest fields are yielding their treasures, and the wide green meadows are growing brown and sere.

The Children's Paradise is silent now, but for nature's voices; even the birds are taking their flight for winter quarters. But where are the little human nestlings? What has the summer done for them? Back again to their city homes they have gone, crowded and pinched in many ways; but they have taken with them that which the long, cold winter cannot take away—strength gained from their vacation among the hills, joy gathered from their stay where love and care did their utmost to make their vacation at Mont-Lawn something worth remembering.

Two thousand little ones have had a summer of unalloyed happiness, days full of the wealth of good things, spread with liberal hand, and nights filled with sweet, peaceful rest. How much good has been accomplished by the summer's sowing and planting at Mont-Lawn can never be estimated until the great Harvest Day, when the ripened sheaves shall be brought in and laid at the Master's feet.

And while happiness and comfort have come to these thousands of children of the poor during the summer of 1905, there has also come to the kind hearts that have made this charity possible, the grateful sense of a kindly beneficence well bestowed. In the homes of these little ones there is a sweeter note; and years from now many who have then grown to manhood and womanhood, will date their first start in the right direction from the good teachings and the love underlying all that gladdened their vacation at our Children's Home.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST R. S. MARTIN has just closed a notable meeting at Le Roy, Kan., 115 new members were enrolled in the churches.

—REV. GEO. H. BROCK, of the American Baptist Mission Orphanage at Kanigiri, Nellore District, India, writes that that district is again facing famine, owing to continued drought and consequent crop failures, three successive seasons. Several hundred natives are getting work from the mission at famine rates.

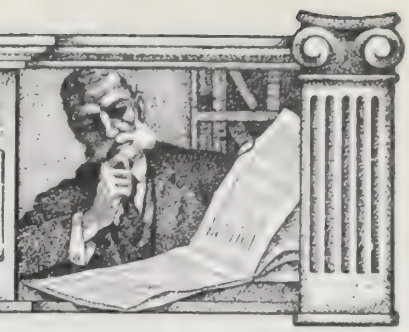
The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER



Disturbances in Baku

NEWS comes from Trans-Caucasia of terrible outbreaks, fiercely suppressed by the Russian Government. The trouble appears to be the old one of Mohammedan hatred of the Armenians, that shows itself under the Czar as under the Sultan. In this instance, it has been brought to a crisis by the indiscretion of the Russian Governor-General, Prince Galitzin. With the aid of the Tartars, who needed no inducement but the assurance of immunity from punishment, Armenians were slaughtered, their property confiscated and their churches desecrated. The Armenians, realizing that no protection could be expected from the government, armed themselves in defense. Ever since February, when a similar attack was made, they have been preparing for just such a crisis, and they were able to make their power felt. But it was a hopeless struggle. The Tartars set fire to the oil wells and the refineries and completely paralyzed the oil industry, by which the people live. The plants of twenty-one oil companies and those of thirteen private owners were destroyed. Of the Rothschild properties only one remains intact. The Tartars continue the work of destruction and kill all who oppose them. The condition of the Armenians was rendered more deplorable by the tribes of the adjacent mountains, who descended in armed bands to get the loot that was sure to be at the mercy of any strong force. They have long been the dread of the Armenians, who paid annual tribute to them for immunity from depredations. These were joined by other hordes from Persia, attracted by the prospect of booty. There was a lull in the outrages last week, but all the signs point to a renewal of hostilities. An inquiry has been held by the government, at which the Tartars and Armenians accused one another of responsibility for the trouble. The glaring fact, however, that it is the Armenian property in the oil fields that has been destroyed, while the Moslem works are intact, shows which party was the aggressor. The Russian government has now eleven thousand men, with three batteries of artillery, on the scene of conflict, but the Armenians are convinced that they have not been sent for their protection, but to prevent their turning on their assailants. Now, as in the days of the ancient preacher, the world still witnesses oppression, cruelty and outrage.

I returned and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of the oppressors was power; but they had no comforter (Eccles. 4: 1).

Saved by His Strength

A young miner at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., had a narrow escape from death recently. He was employed at the Hedleigh breaker, and his duties took him among the machinery. A few days ago he was about his work as usual, when he was caught by the big shaker-chain, and was carried toward the huge cog-wheel over which the chain passes. He struggled frantically as he approached the wheel that would grind him to pieces. Other workmen saw his peril, but could not reach him. He realized that his life was at stake, and bracing himself and gathering all his strength, he put forth a mighty effort. It released him and he fell to the ground unconscious, but safe. Would that men whose souls are at stake when they are being carried to eternal destruction would make such an effort, trusting in the power of Christ to help them.

I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the Lord (Jer. 1: 8).

A Derelict Destroyed

For nearly three months past, reports have been brought by incoming vessels of a dangerous derelict floating in the path of the ships. It was last seen to the south of the Nantucket lightship, and the United States cruiser Columbia was sent out to locate and destroy it. She made a long search but was unable to find it. Being fitted, however, with the wireless system, she received from the Newport naval station fresh indications brought by later arrivals of shipping. Reckoning from these, the captain of the Columbia was able to trace the direction in which the derelict was drifting, and the next day came alongside of it. It lay low in the water, its bow scarcely three feet above the surface and its spars and upper works gone by the board. It was a most dangerous menace to mariners, and, especially at night, when it could not be seen, was liable to cause the wreck of a ship. The captain put two torpedoes in the body of the derelict, which broke it into two pieces, and these two were shattered into fragments by other torpedoes and drifted harmlessly away. It was a wise measure in the circumstances, though it seemed a pity to destroy so strong a vessel. It was not possible to save it, as it is by Christ's power to save the human derelict, who also, unhappily, sometimes causes the wreck of other souls.

One sinner destroyeth much good (Eccles. 9:18).

A Heroic Act

Visitors at Atlantic City, N. J., witnessed a courageous act on the part of a clerk, that undoubtedly saved several lives. He was driving to the Pennsylvania Depot when he saw an omnibus coming down the road. It was full of passengers and was going at a rapid rate. As it drew nearer, the clerk saw that the horses were not under control. Something had frightened them, and they were going furiously into the crowd of vehicles waiting at the depot. The omnibus swayed from side to side to the alarm of the occupants. The driver, perceiving the danger, leaped from his seat to seize the horses' heads, but his feet were entangled in the reins and he fell, narrowly escaping being run over. The clerk, fearing that the scared horses would run over some one, and imperil the passengers in the vehicle behind them, jumped from his vehicle, grasped the trailing reins and held on. He was dragged fully sixty feet, but his weight at last told on the horses and they came to a stand. Every one present applauded him for his bravery in thus risking his life to save others. Such acts rightly command the praise of men, even of those who are not moved when they hear of One who laid down his life for the salvation of the world.

Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness (1. Peter 2: 24).

Scandinavian Peace

The threatened conflict between Norway and Sweden has happily been averted. Norway has yielded on the question of the fortresses, and it is agreed that modern and available works, even of defense, shall not remain in the neutral zone on either side. In return, both sides agree to submit their differences, if any arise, when these differences do not involve the "independence, integrity, or vital interests" of either, to the arbitration of a third party. The treaty also provides that each country shall agree not to interfere, by prohibitory import or export laws, nor make difficult the transport or transit of goods. Transit goods must not be taxed with export duty or similar charges, nor must any distinction be made in charges of transit. No higher charges shall be made than in the case of the country's own subjects. What the world hopes for now is a close friendship between the two governments and peoples, so that there may be no possibility of intrigue by either the Czar or the Kaiser.

Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity (Ps. 133: 1).

A Naval Invention

The officers of the navy are much interested in a new apparatus called the gyroscope, which, it is believed, will be a valuable adjunct to the compass on board steel vessels. There are certain localities, such as the Lizard Rocks on the English coast, in which the compass is powerfully affected and the mariner is in doubt as to the extent of the deviation. The gyroscope is simply a wheel, revolved by electric motor power, in a certain plane, which maintains that plane under all circumstances. It is so fitted that it keeps in a horizontal position, no matter how the ship lurches. Thus, if the wheel is started to run in the plane of the meridian of New York, it will continue revolving parallel to that plane, no matter in what direction or to what distance the vessel goes. Its value is greatest on war vessels, on which big guns and steel casemates affect the action of the magnetic needle. The mariner, knowing the plane on which the gyroscope is set, and sure that it will maintain its movement on that plane, can easily see when, and to what extent, his compass is deflected. Sometimes, in the voyage of life, the Christian has need of such help. His conscience is apt to be deflected by consideration of his own advantage, or his own affections, and fails to indicate his course. Then it is that in the Bible he finds his true bearings in the injunctions and warnings that God has given for his guidance.

To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them (Isa. 8: 20).

"YE ARE THE TEMPLE OF GOD"

Sunday School Lesson, By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE temples of stone—Solomon's, Zerubbabel's and Herod's—were none of them the real temple, any more than a church building is the real church. The building in both cases is but a frame of the real temple, or the real church. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God?" Christ and the Christian are the real temples, of which the temples of stone were but types and promises. Jesus said in the first year of his ministry, "Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up." "He spake of the temple of his body." And those words showed how well he understood that his temple was to have in it the bloody altar of Calvary. "The Word was made flesh and tabernacled among us." He was at once the Lamb of Sacrifice and the High Priest who offered himself. His rent flesh on the Cross, he said, was the torn veil by whose rending the Holy of Holies of God's presence here and hereafter is made accessible to every penitent sinner without the intervention of any other priest. Jesus was himself the last true priest, our High Priest and Mediator forever, and he has become the pattern for our building, whether of individual character or of spiritual churches, and the "Chief Cornerstone" of every true church and of every Christian life.

Souls are built as temples are—
Sunken deep, unseen, unknown,
Lies the sure foundation-stone.
Then the courses framed to bear
Lift the cloisters pillared fair,
Last of all the airy spire,
Soaring heavenward, higher and higher,
Nearest sun and nearest star.

Souls are built as temples are-
Based on truth's eternal law,
Sure and steadfast, without flaw,
Through the sunshine, through the snows,
Up and on the building goes;
Every fair thing finds its place,
Every hard thing lends a grace,
Every hand may make or mar.

SUSAN COOLIDGE.

The Bible sometimes speaks of the individual body as a temple of God—"If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." And sometimes the true temple is pictured as made of "living stones," each one a Christian, "built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the Chief Corner-stone." Let us combine the two and think of the church as made up, like St. Peter's Cathedral, of many chapels, with a mighty central auditorium. The chapels are confessionals, where a person of any land may find a priest to speak to him in his own tongue. Over the doors of these national chapels are the words, "Italiano," "Americano," and the like. Into these men go to confess their sins, but for the great services which are in Latin, men of all lands meet and mingle under the great dome. So each of us in his individual temple, comes face to face with the One High Priest, but we are each but a living part of the great universal Church of God, How shall we build and rebuild individual character, and how to build and rebuild the Church of God? The Jerusalem story is repeated in the spiritual realm.

1. We Must Clear Away the Rubbish. What will hinder character building and rebuilding? Let every man answer honestly for himself. Those same things will hinder spiritual church building. Sometimes the building or rebuilding of a church is delayed because the people are dominated by the sin Jesus condemned more than any other—covetousness. Sometimes it is lack of courage, sometimes it is laziness that blocks the way. "What is original sin?" was asked of an Indian Bible class. One of them answered, "I do not know what it is in others, but in my case I think it is laziness." More people are hindered in character building and spiritual church building by that sin, than by others more disreputable. Another hindrance is a low ideal. A temple will be no grander than its architectural plan. The young men shouted with joy that the foundations of the new temple were laid; but the old men who remembered the size and grandeur of Solomon's Temple, wept when they saw how much inferior the new temple was to be. Well may men weep when they find their ideals for themselves or the church diminishing in what Robert L. Stevenson significantly calls "Middle-aged cowardice."

A florist said of some of his beautiful climbing plants, that when they grew up to the end of the trellis he gently uncoiled their delicate tendrils at night, when they were asleep, and set a larger trellis in the pot. "Now," said he, "I can imagine the plant waking up in the morning and looking up to the top of the new trellis and saying, 'Dear me! I must be going backward instead of forward. Yesterday I was nearly up to the top of my trellis, and look where I am now.' And so," he said, "God sometimes, when he sees we have grown up toward a previous standard, quietly replaces it by a new and loftier one, and it seems to us as though instead of advancing we were declining. The truth is that it is not we who have retrograded, but our ideals have been elevated.

2. Materials were Gathered. Generosity not only builds churches but characters. The Christian Indians in the Mission of the Bishop of Caledonia, said, "We must build God's house." An Indian, who worked hard for his living, started the subscription with one hundred dollars. Two others followed with half as much. Then Hannah, a washerwoman, came with one hundred dollars. "Oh, Hannah, this is too much for you," said the missionary. "Oh, no!" she replied, "I have something left." The Indians gave not only money but themselves. When the missionary's wife fell sick, ten Indians started for the doctor sixty miles away — a three-days' pull, hard and dangerous, on a rough sea. The doctor was brought and carried back. "What shall I pay you, Captain, for your splendid service?" said the Bishop to the leader." Bishop, don't ask that of the others; it will break their hearts. There is no gold in the world that would have tempted us to go on such a sea. She had showed herself, willing to die for us. Could we do less than die for her?"

John R. Mott visited a college in Ceylon, where he found a band of students so poor that sixteen of them occupied one room. Near the building was a garden, in which they spent their spare time cultivating bananas. When Mr. Mott inquired: "What do you do with the money?" they took him to the shore and pointed to an island off in the sea. "Two years ago," they said, "we sent one of our graduates there. He started a school, and it has developed now into a church. We are going to send him to another island this year." They also said that they had instructed their cook that every tenth handful of rice should be laid aside, to be sold for missionary work.

In contrast to these stories of missionary converts, let us quote the Missionary Review: "An artist was once asked to paint a picture of a dying church. Instead of putting on canvas a small, feeble, poor congregation in an old building, he painted a stately, modern edifice, through the open portals of which could be seen the richly carved pulpit, the magnificent organ, and the beautiful stained glass windows. Just within the entrance, guarded on either side by a 'pillar of the church,' in spotless apparel, was a contribution plate of goodly workmanship, for the 'offerings' of fashionable worshipers. But right above the plate, suspended from a nail in the wall, there hung a small box, bearing the legen 'Collection for Foreign Missions,' and over the sl through which certain contributions should have go was a huge cobweb!"

There are other cobwebs in the churches besides glected benevolences. A seeming trifle, some pettin of envy or spite, sometimes sets a whole church awr "What ails the clock?" said Mr. Jones; "it is twel but our clock, which has always kept good time, is half hour behind." "I was late at school," said Els "and missed a beautiful new song Miss Prentiss w teaching. I have not been late before all this term "It was the clock," said father. "Go and borrow Au Jane's watch lest you should be late again to-morrow, the clock does run behind again. Now I have put forward, we will have it fixed." Next day it was slow still, and father set it ahead, but it kept getting slow and slower. At last he opened the door to see if could discover the trouble. There was a spider's we wonderful, but in the wrong place. The web was brush away and the clock thereafter did its duty. When church fails to bear the right testimony in word and lif it is often because some of the petty sins of pride or en or self-seeking, are tangling the heartstrings of t people. If it is to "strike twelve," these must brushed away by faithf preaching and teaching, a heart searching.

3. Obstacles Overcom The worst obstacles e countered in rebuilding t temple, were not the ru bish, but bad peopl who proffered a dangero and hypocritical friendshi Nothing so hinders chara ter-building as friendshi with bad people, and not ing so hinders the upbuil ing of a church as lettin the bad Samaritans get o the inside. But faith an hope and charity overcom all obstacles. In New Ze land, missionaries toiled i vain for eleven years. No 95,000 of the island's popu lation are professing Chris tians. The mission of th American Board suffere more than any others fro the Boxers uprising, bu already there are 885 mor church members in thos missions than before th massacres.

The stones with whic martyrs are stoned, reall help to build up its walls So in individual character building we may know an worship God, and rejoice i him despite the most seriou obstacles. Helen Keller blind, deaf and dumb, ha been wonderfully taught t communicate, but nothing had been said to her of religion. The time had come, i was felt, when some one of great skill should tell her o God, and Bishop Phillips Brooks went from Boston, al the way to her Alabama home to do this. He told her, through her teacher-interpreter, of the glory of the heavens, the color and perfume of the flowers, the melody of birds, the splendor of mountain, sea and sky; and then, with a prayer for God's help, he said gently: "Helen, the great and good Being who made all these is called God." "O, yes," she said, "I knew him all the time, but I did not know his name before."

In a recent gathering of Christians, a solo was announced. A blind girl was guided by a companion to a position in front of the audience. The people waited with breathless interest to hear what she would sing, expecting some such tender, pathetic hymn of resignation as "My Jesus as Thou Wilt." There was hardly a dry eye when she sang a hymn of triumphant and victorious joy, ringing out the chorus with especial power:

Hallelujah to God! How my happy heart sings,
For the peace and the joy I have found!
Hallelujah to God! I will praise him aloud:
I'm redeemed! I'm redeemed! I'm redeemed!

Open the door, let in the sun,
He hath a smile for every one:
He hath made of the raindrops gold and gems,
He may change our tears to diadems—
Open the door!

Open the door of the soul; let in Strong, pure thoughts which will banish sin:
They will grow and bloom with a grace divine,
And their fruit shall be sweeter than that of the vine—
Open the door!

Open the door of the heart; let in Sympathy sweet for stranger and kin:
It will make the halls of the heart so fair
That angels may enter unaware—
Open the door!

"They praised the Lord because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid"

Our Household Circle

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Talk with Young Girls

SUPPOSE it is quite hard for you, Dorothy and Eva, to realize that your grandmother was ever a girl like yourselves, with the same round, blooming eeks, the same dancing dimples, the same propensity t giggle, and the same love of fun in season and out. he generation always has a good deal of trouble in rea- ling another. If you look at one of those delicate da- gerreotypes which were taken in the early fifties, you n fancy pretty accurately what sort of girl your grand- ther was. I want you to send your thoughts back- rd to a still older day, to show you the sort ideal that wise people had for girls in the tant, latter part of the eighteenth century, en your grandmother's grandmother may ve been a child.

On the tenth of May, 1784, Dr. Samuel John- , then at the height of his fame and a very at man indeed, sat him down to write a ter to his godchild, Miss Jane Langton, of nt. Dr. Johnson in London, was farther ay from Jane in Kent, than somebody in w York is from somebody in Chicago, or St. uis, or San Francisco to-day. The letter was itten in a large hand as clear and plain as nt, and this is what it said:

DEAREST MISS JENNY:

am sorry that your pretty letter has been so long thout being answered, but when I am not very well o not always write plain enough for young ladies. I'm glad, my dear, to see that you write so well, and be that you will mind your pen, your book, and ur needle, for they are all necessary. Your books ll give you knowledge and make you respected, and ur needle will find you useful employment when you do not care to read. When you are a little older, I be you will be very diligent in learning arithmetic, d above all, that through your whole life, you will efully say your prayers and read your Bible. I , my dear, your most humble servant, SAM JOHNSON.

Dr. Johnson was rather in advance of his pe- od. At that time girls did not spend much me in the schoolroom. If they could read, rite and cipher, they were considered very ell educated. Indeed, it was a usual thing r elegant and distinguished women of fashion make atrocious blunders in spelling. Boys re thoroughly taught their books, and they re especially drilled in the classics. As for eir sisters, it was taken for granted that most their education should be domestic. Young dies were welcome to the crumbs that fell om learning's table, but only to the crumbs. ow and then, a girl clamored for more than is, and if she carried her point she was called 'blue stocking," and it was hinted that the ockings on her feet were probably full of les. Be it noted, however, that even then in ly a few ladies were great scholars. They re exceptional.

Here in America, a little more than a hun- ed years ago, girls were permitted to attend e Latin School in Boston, provided there re empty benches; the rule was, boys first d girls second. A girl who could write a ight and chatty letter, read aloud agreeably, ep household accounts, and use her needle th skill for herself and the poor, was a well ucated girl in those days. If, in addition, e knew how to paint flowers in water colors, play on the harp, and read a little Italian or rench, she was highly accomplished.

Stress was laid on several points which the others of that time regarded as essential. r instance, a girl must stand well, carry rself well, make a sweeping curtsey with ace, and be very erect. She must know w to sit up straight in her chair, with her nds on her lap and without crossing her legs dangling her feet. These tricks met with mediate rebuke. Mrs. Sherwood, who was a rl about that time, and who afterward became popular author, was obliged during her childhood and r early teens, to spend some hours every day with a iff board known as a back-board, strapped firmly gainst her spine. This was to keep her from bending.

You observe that Dr. Johnson in writing to Jenny, pes that she will say her prayers and read her Bible ily all her life. The old-fashioned ideal was a religious eal. No girl was thought womanly or attractive, who eglected the duties of daily piety. It were well for us uld we fully restore this. No girl has a well developed ture who lacks self-control, sweetness and generosity. he spiritual part of us must be developed. We must ave the kingdom of Heaven in our hearts if we are to o bravely and triumphantly through this world. For this we must, as Dr. Johnson said, pray daily, and daily read the Bible. Apart from its value as God's Book, no girl is even half educated who does not familiarly know the English Bible, who is not acquainted with its people and familiar with its literature.

Dr. Johnson set Miss Jenny a good example when he wrote her a letter in script that she could read. A great many girls write illegible hands. One has to puzzle over their letters to find out what they mean to say. Girls do not always write their signatures plainly. The body of the letter can be read, but the signature is a sort of blind trail, losing itself in space. When you think of it, the real reason for writing at all is that writing may be read. Good penmanship is simply strong, clear, plain penmanship, that taxes nobody's temper and tries nobody's eyesight. Think of others when you write.

The old-fashioned ideal forbade girls to be mannish. They were almost too strictly guarded from hoydenish ways. They might not run and jump, they could not go out in the rain because they wore very thin shoes, and they waited far too much on their brothers. On the whole, Dorothy dear, you and Eva and the other girls have a better time, studying, working and playing with your brothers, and letting them wait on you rather more than you wait on them. You have an advantage over the little grandmother of the long ago, have you not?

The Inner Life of the Home

STRANGE as it may seem, it is perfectly possible in these busy and rushing days, for a home to be nothing but a mere outside shell. The men and women of to-day have so many benefactions to carry on; find so many channels for their energy outside their own doors, that, while they love one another devotedly in the ordinary relations, the husband and wife, parents and children, they may see comparatively little of one another except at meals. "My busy husband," said a wife in commenting on a state of affairs which she deprecated but could not alter, "is so necessary to our city and so absorbed in our church that our children hardly know him. He is away in the morning before the little ones are up, and returns after they are in bed. When the older children are studying their lessons, he is engaged with this or the other Board or Committee, and his Sundays, from morning to night, are given to the church. I feel," she added, "that he is doing his duty as a citizen, and I must make up, so far as I can, what he would be were he more in the home."

There are wives who fail in no jot or tittle of home economy. Their children are well dressed and well behaved; their housekeeping is notable, but they themselves are managing Orphanages and Homes for indigent women, and Homes for old people, and are carrying on hospital work and writing papers for clubs, and putting themselves into the service of the public fully as much as into the life of the home. So it comes to pass that the home is merely a place for eating and sleeping, the shell within which the household is cramped, not the atmosphere in which it expands and flourishes. Something is wrong when the home has no sweet, rich inner life. Those who love one another should have time for private conversation, for the happy household life which goes rippling on, its current full and deep, for household gaiety, for household growth. Love is defrauded of its own when people give too much time and strength to outside interests. These interests may be of the noblest, most altruistic and most devout, but home life should be set before them in the scheme of married people.

Only Half-Well

Far too often, people who ought to be altogether well, are only half well. They have some ache or pain of which to complain. Some people are chronically out of sorts. Either they are nervous, or they have dyspepsia, or headache, or toothache, or a pain in the back, or a tired feeling, or something that mars physical and spiritual ease. They are like the old colored mammy who prided herself on always answering a question about her health with the phrase: "Very miserable, thank you." It is the easiest thing in the world to fall into a fashion of semi-invalidism, and to declare oneself not up to the mark, when one has slept ill, or over-eaten, or worked too hard. Numbers of people do not work hard enough, with the result that they suffer from ennui, which, in itself, leads to disease. It should be considered one of life's solemn duties to keep well if one can, and disease should be considered a great misfortune. To be half-well is to be half-equipped for the battle of life, to be only half-ready to do one's share of the daily task. People who are half-well are seldom in good spirits, and their melancholy acts as a wet blanket on the good cheer of others. When it cannot be helped, this state of things must be accepted. When it can, to yield to it is almost a sin. Most of us are much "too ready with complaint" of one kind or another, in this "fair world of God's," and it would be well for us to remember that physical health is generally to be found in strict obedience to God's law. We have a right to be well, not to be sick or even half-well.

The "Father of Nobody's Children"

JIM JERVIS never knew his father. His mother, who was always sick, died in a workhouse infirmary. Left alone in the world when only five years of age, Jim chafed under the restraint of the workhouse school, so one day he made a successful dash for liberty, and began an independent existence as a street arab.

For a time, a woman who once knew his mother allowed him to sleep in an open shed, and occasionally gave him broken bits of food. Then he did odd jobs for a lighterman on a barge. But this man—"Swearin' Dick"—was a cruel master. Moreover, he had an ugly dog aboard, "and wunst, when Dick were drunk, he put the dog on me," said Jim, pulling aside some of his rags and showing scarred marks, as of teeth, on his leg. So the little fellow watched his chance and ran away. But the big boys on the street wouldn't let him go with them, and he "took up by himself."

Jim was ragged, dirty, and pinched with hunger. One raw winter night, in 1866, when he was ten years old, he appeared with neither shirt, shoes nor stockings at a ragged school in Stepney. This school was held in a disused donkey stable, the rafters and walls of which had been whitewashed, and the earth floor covered with boards. It was taught by a young medical student who was preparing at London Hospital for missionary service in China, and who gave up two nights of each week to the conduct of the school.

All the scholars had left the room, but Jim lingered near the fire. The doctor was weary, wanted to put out the lights, and told the boy to go home.

"Please, sir, do let me stop. I won't do no 'arm. A boy tell'd me to come up 'ere to the school to get a warm, an' he sed p'raps you'd let me lie nigh the fire all night."

"What would your mother think?"

"Ain't got no mother."

"But your father?"

"Ain't got no father."

"Don't tell me such stories, boy. Where are your friends? Where do you live?"

"Ain't got no friends. Don't live nowhere."

The friendless boy was questioned further, and his simple, straightforward story was a revelation to the young physician, who thought, "Is it possible that in this great city there are others homeless and destitute, suffering with cold, hunger and exposure?"

"Tell me," he asked, "are there other poor boys like you in London without a home or friends?"

"Oh yes, sir, lots—'eaps on 'em."

At the nearest coffee-house the boy was allowed to satisfy his hunger, and then, about midnight, the doctor set out, piloted by Jim, to see where the don't-live-nowheres sleep.

Climbing to the dome-shaped iron roof of a shed they found eleven boys asleep, huddled together, with no covering of any kind save the starlit sky, the rags that they wore being mere apologies for clothes. One larger boy was hugging a little fellow in his arms to keep him warm.

Dr. Thomas J. Barnardo had found his life-work. Others might go to China. In the wintry moonlight, on that iron roof, he dedicated himself to the work of saving the homeless children who live in the streets of London.

A few weeks later, at a dinner where he met Lord Shaftesbury and other philanthropists, Barnardo told what he had seen. But no one seemed ready to believe that on that bleak winter night, in the very heart of London, children were sleeping out in the open air. They asked him to show them the strange sight. Cabs were therefore ordered, and a number of gentlemen in evening dress drove to Billingsgate, where, in a pile of boxes, crates and barrels, seventy-three boys were found seeking shelter for the night.

A house in Stepney Causeway was rented and soon opened as a "Home for Destitute Lads." This beneficent work for the physical betterment and moral uplift of the wretched poor has developed until there are now ninety separate homes and twenty-five mission branches. The cottages are attractive and homelike. Each is in charge of a motherly matron, and accommodates not more than twenty-five, so that each child receives personal care.

Sixty thousand children saved from the life of the streets, trained in useful arts and placed in homes or settled on Canadian farms, have earned for Dr. Barnardo the title, "Father of Nobody's Children."

PROMINENT MEN OF THE HOUR

LOUIS OF BATTENBERG — SENATOR CULLOM — JAMES TANNER — WU TING FANG

PRINCE LOUIS OF BATTENBERG, an admiral in the British navy, is in charge of a squadron making a friendly cruise along our Atlantic coast, and stopping at our large seaports. His visit in Canadian waters gave great pleasure to the loyal people of the Dominion. He was born in Austria, and became a naturalized British subject. He has served in the navy since 1868. His wife is a granddaughter of Queen Victoria.

"CORPORAL" JAMES TANNER is the new head of the Grand Army of the Republic. No convention of that body has been complete without his genial presence, and his election was received with great satisfaction by the Posts from Maine to California.

MR. WU TING FANG, one of the most popular envoys that the Celestial Kingdom ever sent to this country, recently had a narrow escape from death while on a journey. Mr. Wu was in charge of a large party of students who were bound for the coast, in order to come to America to be educated. Reformers in China are such at the risk of their lives, for a bomb was thrown into the train, killing ten and wounding many more.

SENATOR CULLOM, of Illinois, extracts from whose Mormon article will be found on another page, is of especial interest to our readers as the first man who introduced an anti-Mormon bill into any legislative body in the United States. One of the oldest of our Senators, he is at the same time one of the most active, and his sound judgment, able pen, and eloquent tongue will serve his country for years to come. His life from an early age has been passed in the public harness.

To Wash Ostrich Feathers:

Make a suds of Ivory Soap and lukewarm water, dip the feather in and draw it through the hand a few times. If very dirty wash through two suds, then rinse through several bowls of clear water.

When clean draw through the hand until almost dry, then place it on the thigh and slap it with the hand to bring it out fluffy.

It takes some practice to do this, but by experimenting with a poor feather the proper way to handle a good one can soon be learned.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

SUNDAY MORNING SERVICE

AT THE OLD BOWERY MISSION

By Supt. J. G. Hallimond

CHRISTIAN HERALD space during the summer season is rightfully allotted to other subjects than the Bowery Mission. The association of ideas brings the minds of its readers to vastly different scenes; to seashore and mountains, to camp meetings and Chautauquas, to the gambols of children at Mont-Lawn, and other Open-Air and Fresh-Air schemes of beneficence and blessing.

But the Bowery Mission is never closed during the summer months, and the great surging crowd that is the object of its ministrations, so far as the meetings go, shows not the slightest sign of decrease. Amongst the homeless, of course there is not the bitter suffering that the cold piercing winter weather causes, but there is hunger, want, sickness, idleness, and poverty, in all their varied and distressful forms, and there is the great soul-hunger, which, more than anything else, tends to draw the large crowd continually within our doors.

Superintendent J. G. Hallimond

Thousands of your readers who are constantly thinking about, praying for, and helping in many ways to sustain the work, never have had an opportunity of attending its meetings, or of seeing it face to face with its great and growing task of rescuing perishing men. May I ask them, therefore, in a few paragraphs of space, to look at a rough sketch of one of our summer Sunday morning meetings? It is typical of all the rest, though the incidental details are continually changing.

It is 11.30 A.M. Mrs. Bird, the beloved "Mother of the Bowery," is present as leader of the meeting. For over thirteen years she has met her "boys" in this Sunday morning meeting. Notwithstanding her incessant labors both at Gospel Settlement in the near-by Ghetto, and at the Mission, her friends have only prevailed upon her to spend but a few days this year in the country. She ascends the platform, and with a smiling face bids the boys "Good Morning." Every seat in the large hall is occupied. Many of the men in the front benches are well-dressed, eager, and alert looking. These are the permanent residents of the Bowery from the better class lodging houses, and this is their church. They know the importance of being in time, and would not miss the Sunday morning service for a great deal.

Behind them is a strange and motley crowd. Poor, tired "travelers," physically worn out, have fallen asleep as soon as seated, to be wakened later by the singing of the first hymn, or the kindly nudge of the usher. Here is a victim of a Saturday night brawl, with bandaged head, and redolent with carbolic. There is a youth whose grimy face and torn coat vouch for a recent journey on a freight car. Here is a pale, sickly candidate for Bellevue Hospital; there is one who has just come out. "A strange crowd," as Pastor Charles Wagner said, but they are all God's children.

Twenty or thirty of the converts who have been engaged in the preparatory prayer meeting in the kitchen, now take their places on the platform. A few visitors appear, and are placed beside them. Meanwhile, the strains of the great organ have vibrated over the heads and into the hearts of the multitude, and a solemn hush rests upon all, that strangely reminds one of the waiting moments of some imposing cathedral service. At a signal from Mrs. Bird, the precentor announces the first hymn. The sleepers awake, and gradually unite with those who have promptly struck the first line, until when every individual tributary voice has joined the main stream of song, its volume has become a veritable Niagara of praise. Oh, how these men do enjoy singing!

After several hymns, there comes a part of the service, which is, I believe, almost peculiar to the Bowery Mission, and which is one of remarkable beauty and impressiveness. The moment has arrived for "family prayer," as our Mother delights to call it, and, like a mother, she gently leads these poor fellows to the mercy seat of the Father. She has spent the early hours of this Sabbath Day in secret prayer for her "boys," and she brings them comfort and counsel straight from the heart of God himself. But her effort now is to get the men to pray for themselves, so, gently and tenderly, just as though she were speaking in some quiet home circle, she says: "Now, boys, if you have any fret upon your hearts, let us know it, and let God know it."

The response is immediate and eager. One after another rises, and asks prayer for those, who, notwithstanding such a long and bitter separation from them, they love so dearly. Some of the requests are made by the same men, in identical language, every meeting, but they are none the less sincere for that. The petition is offered in these cases as a loving and religious duty; often, may be, as an expiation for long neglect. Many requests are uttered with an intense, almost passionate, vehemence, born of a terrible and overwhelming need,—"pray for me, a poor, miserable drunkard!" "Pray that I may get work!" A young boy rises with swimming eyes, and says, "Pray for my mother!" then chokes, and sits down sobbing. It is not wonderful that when, at last, the Sunday morning prayer is offered by the Superintendent, there are few who are not vitally interested in the presentation.

After the prayer and more congregational singing, and responsive Scripture reading, the "message" is given, and surely there is not a more attentive or appreciative congregation in all the metropolitan churches than this sub-world crowd. Then come the testimonies, and wonderful testimonies they are. Here is a young man, converted three years ago in the Mission, but now living with his mother in Buffalo. He tells us he has been granted two weeks vacation, and felt he must spend it in attending the meetings at his beloved spiritual birthplace. Hence, his presence with us this morning. Since his conversion, he has spent all his leisure time in mission work, and, in earnest, fiery language, declares his intention of doing so to the end.

The subject of the morning message has been "Prayer." A young man rises who is well known, since he is one of the regular leaders. Six years ago he entered the Mission, a tramp. Now he is foreman in a large city factory. He testifies to his having learned a valuable lesson during the Mission Bible Class studies of the previous winter, viz.: that the "Secret Place" is always available, even to the busy business man, and may be found, as he has found it, even in the midst of the whirling activity of the factory itself.

This testimony brings to his feet a middle-aged man, who tells us that although, by misfortune, he has been reduced to such absolute penury, that, last night he walked the streets, yet he was able to spend the otherwise dreary, weary hours in sweet communion with God.

Then a respectable and intelligent looking man rises from the rear of the platform, and, gazing lovingly upon a bonny girl seated at his side, says, "Boys, I'm glad to tell you I have one of my daughters with me this morning. A few months ago I was a disreputable drunkard, estranged from my wife and two children,

VELLASTIC UNDERWEAR

A New Kind of Undergarment That Is Fast Coming Into Universal Use.

In the stores this winter may be seen the new style of underwear made by the Utica Knitting Company, and known as Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear.

By reason of its low price—fifty cents a garment—and its superior quality, this line of underwear is coming into great demand.

Its elasticity, which results from its rib feature, combined with its warm fleece, makes Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece especially desirable for persons whose work involves much bodily movement or exposure to the weather.

Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear always retains its shape and elasticity in washing, and the fleece its downy softness.

stranger that he is. But we have turned up our noses in turn at the Irish, the Germans and all the rest who have come and peopled our great plains and felled our forests and made our wilderness blossom like a garden wherever they have gone, and put each the best of their strong stock into our national character. What better basis for American citizenship would you wish, than this, that a man loves his native land? Do you think he will make a good son of the new home, who begins by spurning the old? I know this Italian, who in my time has built a united nation out of a job-lot of shop-worn principalities, paid his honest debts and taken his stand among the proud peoples of the earth; and when I see his flag going down the street on the slightest pretext for a parade, with Old Glory flanking it right and left, I marvel at our short-sightedness in not turning this patriotic enthusiasm to account. The politician is learning the trick, and if he takes Pasquale into camp, we can blame ourselves, not him.

And so it is with the rest: Bohemian, Hungarian, Finn, all with the bitter lessons of the past that prepare men for freedom as the good days cannot, material for citizenship quite equal to the best. I draw the line at the Asiatic, not because of the color of his skin, but because of the warp of his mind, which is not mine. I do not understand him, and sometimes I have an uncomfortable feeling that he understands me only too well. And I think that is true of all of us. We don't mix, and mixing is essential if we are to make of our immigrant mortar to build a nation with that which will endure. Mind, I speak of them as material. We are to do the building, It cannot be said too often, or too loudly, that it is not altogether what they bring us across the sea that counts, but what we meet them with here. Let it be the slum for a home, the gutter for a playground for their children; let it be the spirit that "he shall get that can, and he that hath shall keep," and nothing more, and you may look for a crop to correspond. One does not sow thistles and reap wheat. If we receive them merely to exploit their labor at the lowest wage, we shall fare accordingly; we shall have a problem on our hands of our own making. Receive them as those who come to help build our common country and make it great; send them away from the cities where their peril lies and ours, and they will not be a threat to the labor market, but a prop under it.

I spoke before of the function of the settlement movement in making way for the real democracy. My friend says well that, "the Settlement is not a place, but a state of mind." The definition holds for America in its deeper sense. It also has come to make the true democracy, not merely politically, but spiritually as well. For only so can the Kingdom come on earth.

Is it strange that for this should be needed the best strength, the warmest blood of all the nations? And to a much greater extent than we perhaps imagine, we have in fact been receiving that. I was struck in the London slums by the difference between their poverty and ours. To me theirs seems dead and without hope. Not even the Five Points, or the Mulberry Bend, were that here in the old days, though they were our worst. There was yeast in them, and it was hard at work throwing up to the surface that which was still of use. And so wonderful is this poor human nature of ours, which in poverty and degradation is still made in the image of God, that there is no telling, and will not be, till the final reckoning, how many Abraham Goldsteins may have come unsuspected through the despised gate which some of us would so rashly shut.

Sunday Morning Service at the Bowery Mission

frequenting the lowest saloons of Mulberry Bend. Now my life is transformed; my home is rebuilt; my wife and children respect and love me; and it has all come about through my accepting Christ here in the Bowery Mission."

And so the testimonies come in quick succession. A young boy, away on his first spree, and rescued a few nights ago, says a few timorous words. A German carpenter and an Irish laborer, sitting side by side, tell how they drank together, walked the streets at night together, came to the mission together, and were converted at the same hour. An intelligent and eloquent tongued man, who was at one time a member of a Western State Legislature, tells of his downfall through drink, and of his recent recovery, and many other equally thrilling stories are told, until we realize that the allotted time of the service has flown swiftly by, and we must close.

An invitation hymn is sung. It is "Just as I Am," to the wonderfully plaintive strains of the music of our late organist, Victor Benke, and, as a redeemed man sings it, the power and pathos of Charlotte Elliott's hymn are more than ever evident, and it is not difficult to see how deeply moved is our great crowd of "poor, wretched, blind," and broken-hearted men. Immediate decision is now strongly urged, and more than twenty men rise to their feet in token of surrender.

The interesting incidents common to all our services by no means finish with the doxology. Here is a man waiting to shake hands with us, who has come all the way from Glasgow, Scotland, to seek his brother, and has found him at the Bowery Mission. He will return by the same boat next week, bearing the tidings to the waiting ones at home that the wanderer is now "clothed, and in his right mind."

An old man tugs at my coat-sleeve. "Mr. Hallimond," he says, "that incident of the broken screw that you gave as an illustration in your address, occurred at Nettlefold's works in Birmingham, England." "Yes," I say, "do you know Birmingham?" And his eyes drop as he replies, "Ah, yes, my father was once mayor of the city." And the son, alas, is now a denizen of the Bowery.

Then comes our "after-meeting," but that deserves a story of itself.

As the expenses of the work of the Mission are unusually heavy at the present time, contributions will be gladly received and acknowledged. Checks and money orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Treasurer.

"GOLD GOLD"

"Good," He Says, "But Comfort Better."

"Food that fits is better than a gold mine," says a grateful man.

"Before I commenced to use Grape-Nuts food no man on earth ever had a worse infliction from catarrh of the stomach than I had for years.

"I could eat nothing but the very lightest food, and even that gave me great distress.

"I went through the catalogue of prepared foods, but found them all (except Grape-Nuts) more or less indigestible, generating gas in the stomach (which in turn produced headache and various other pains and aches), and otherwise unavailable for my use.

"Grape-Nuts food I have found easily digested and assimilated, and it has renewed my health and vigor and made me a well man again. The catarrh of the stomach has disappeared entirely with all its attendant ills, thanks to Grape-Nuts, which now is my almost sole food. I want no other." Christian Work at Tampa

Rev. Joseph Norwood writes from Ybor City Station, Tampa, Fla., as follows:

I received your gift of $50 contributed towards our work by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for which please accept our sincere thanks and convey same to the generous contributors. We accept it as coming from above through the hands of some consecrated servants of the Father of lights. Our work here is a very peculiar one. It is American because it is situated in the United States. It is purely foreign because it is conducted exclusively in the Spanish language and for the more than ten thousand Cubans and Spaniards who reside in West Tampa and Ybor City. The latter is a ward of Tampa and the former is divided from Tampa only by the Hillsboro river. It is missionary because the people do not know enough about the Gospel to think of doing anything towards its support, and almost as fast as they are converted they return to Cuba, and many of them are doing excellent mission work now in the little republic on their native island. Several of the best native preachers now at work with the various denominations in Cuba were converted in this mission. Another peculiar feature of this work is that the Cuban colony is largely made up of young men, who have left Cuba and come here only to work by the week in the many large cigar factories established here. This is a regular appointment in the bounds of the Florida Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, South, and the Board of Foreign Missions of this church pays the salary of the missionary in charge but gives nothing for enlarging or developing the work. A gymnasium and night school for young men and an industrial school for boys and girls are much needed and would be well patronized. If we had the means to supply the plant, the patronage would be sufficient to cover all running expenses, including salaries of teachers and physical director. We already have evening classes in the sitting-room and dining-room of the parsonage, and something of a library begun in the preacher's study, which adjoins the church and is only a few feet from the parsonage, and we consider the $50 above referred to as an indication that the Lord, through his people, is going to supply what we need for greater things in his name.

Incidents of Prison-Gate Work

TWO weeks ago, a young man of respectable family, but who had just been released from prison, came to the Prison Gate Mission, at 150 Baxter Street, New York City, asking for friendly help and advice in the hour of need. His people could aid him, but he declared he would rather die than write home and let his mother know of his disgrace. The Mission fed and sheltered him, and he decided from henceforth, with God's help, to live an honest Christian life. In a few days he started out to find employment. He tried a dozen places, but without success. As soon as it became known that he had a prison record, he was sharply turned away. He called again at the Mission and told Chaplain Munro, the Superintendent, that he was greatly distressed over his failure to find work. The Superintendent was fortunately able to introduce him to an employer and he is now doing well.

During September over seven hundred persons were met at the prison gate by the Mission workers. The Mission fed, sheltered and clothed fifty-seven of these, until they were otherwise provided for. It found employment for twenty-six. Best of all, nine persons expressed a desire to live a Christian life. This is a record for thirty-five days of the Mission's work.

M. L., a young man who had been in prison a year, came to the Mission for help. He was greeted kindly and invited to a Friday evening Gospel service. He came with his wife. Both knelt in prayer and afterwards confessed Christ as Saviour.

W., who had been out of prison some weeks, came to the Mission office seeking employment. He was greatly discouraged. On his knees he earnestly appealed to God for help. His prayer has been answered. He is now at work and doing well.

The Prison-Gate Mission is greatly hampered in its work by lack of means. Contributions may be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. Andrew A. Knowles, 33 Wall Street, or to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. A. H. D., New York. "I have been led so close to the 'pearly gates' that I was ready to go, but my work here is not yet finished. God does indeed answer our prayer if our faith is strong enough."

J. L. J., Pa. "I am enjoying the confidence, the obedience, the industry, and hearty co-operation of forty-five pupils of a public school, because of the loving helpfulness in answer to daily prayer in their behalf."

A Simple Test for Every Woman Who Reads The Christian Herald —Sent FREE

If you wish to make it, we will send free for that purpose (see offer below) a generous sample of

Pompeian Massage Cream

Pompeian Massage Cream is intended primarily for the face, neck and bust, but you can make the test on your hand and see the result.

We say that soap and water will take off the dirt, but won't take out the dirt. And it is the dirt that is in—not the dirt that is on—that makes the skin muddy and sallow; that keeps the rosy blood from the circulation it seeks.

HERE IS THE TEST: Wash your hands thoroughly in warm water and with the best obtainable soap; use a flesh brush if you like. In other words, get your hands just as clean as old-time methods will permit, then apply Pompeian Massage Cream; rub it in gently but firmly. It is quickly absorbed, and a minute's more massage will bring it OUT of the pores, together with the dirt which has accumulated there.

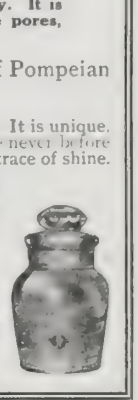
If this test does not convince anyone of the merit and desirability of Pompeian Massage Cream, we have nothing more to say.

Pompeian Massage Cream has many imitators, but never has been duplicated. It is unique. Its use so cleanses the pores that a sense of cleanliness will result such as you have never before experienced. It contains no grease. It leaves the skin without a trace of shine.

This trade mark is on every bottle of genuine Pompeian Massage Cream. Look for it.

If you must "try before you buy," send for the sample and our handsome book, give the name of your dealer and state whether he has Pompeian Cream or not. If you are willing to "buy before you try," ask your dealer for Pompeian Massage Cream. Do not accept a substitute. Sold by mail when dealer (send his name) will not supply. Price 50c. and $1.00 a jar.



Gentlemen also find it a great luxury, particularly after shaving. It removes the soap rubbed into the pores and takes away the smart after a close shave. Tell your husband, brother or sweetheart to give it a trial. It is applied by the best barbers (look for name and trade-mark on jar) or may be used at home.

Mormonism a National Menace

IN a remarkable contribution to the September issue of the North American Review, the Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, United States Senator from Illinois, reviews the Mormon situation. In view of the present anti-polygamy agitation, and the national movement by the women of America for the retirement of the Mormon Senator, Reed Smoot, the following extracts which we are permitted to make from Senator Cullom's powerful presentation of the case will be read with unusual interest and appreciation.

He addresses himself first to the question, "Is Mormonism a menace?" and points out the danger to a republic—"of a tendency, either public or private, religious, judicial, communal, or individual, to set at defiance, or even to evade or ignore, the laws of the land under which the perpetrators claim protection. . . . There is no excuse for the man, the corporation, the community or the court that would set aside the laws of the land, either by ignoring or defying them. . . . . There is nothing which can justify the deliberate and persistent breaking of any law, and a tendency to attempt to do so is a grave menace to the prosperity and integrity of all who are associated, even remotely, with the wrong-doers."

After referring to the Senate Investigation Committee, and the work it has accomplished, Senator Cullom proceeds:

"Many assertions have also been made, some under oath, that the principle of polygamy is already dead. But it has been freely admitted that, to a limited extent, at least, polygamous lives are still lived among the Mormons, obviously justified by the church, since the First President acknowledges himself an active polygamist; winked at by society and ignored by courts of justice on account of certain extenuating circumstances. Now, circumstances may extenuate many things between individuals, and it is possible, I suppose, that, in the present peculiar conditions, there are some who honestly consider that the extenuating circumstances are sufficient to mitigate the malevolent influence of setting law at defiance. As between individuals this may be true; but, so far as any law of the land is being set aside, defied, under cover and protection of Mormonism, Mormonism itself is a menace, regardless of any or all mitigating and extenuating circumstances.

"Polygamy alone, to-day, is not a menace of the gravest importance; for, though it is contemptible and demoralizing, it is a practice so deprecated by and abhorrent to all right minds and all sense of integrity in the civilized world that, church or no church, it must, of necessity, die of its own shame the moment that it comes in contact with clean theories and modern lives. It could never have held out against the higher sentiments of humanity, even under the shadow of its Endowment House, when railways created intercourse and real men and women began to penetrate its solitudes. From without, not from within, comes the best assurance that it will never again be the menacing arm of Mormonism that it appeared to be a few years ago, in its unapproachable isolation. It is the spirit of evading the law which pervades whatever remains of the practice to-day, that constitutes the menace of polygamy; and more of a menace than even the selfish sensuality which instigated the practice."

Senator Cullom refers to the conditions under which Utah became a State, and says:

"A proviso was inserted in the act, by the Congress, that anti-polygamy legislation should be enacted. It was enacted; but we know that from the first it has been ignored, in some cases at least—effectually proving that, when Statehood lifted Utah out of the jurisdiction of Territorial law to be a law unto herself, the pungent force of the necessity which brought about the second revelation was felt to be removed. There is conflicting evidence as to whether plural marriages are still surreptitiously performed, but no one denies that polygamous lives are still openly lived, right about the courts of justice.

"If plural marriages still take place under Mormon auspices, if polygamous lives are still lived under Mormon protection, and if the State of Utah or any other State is unable or unwilling to cope with violations of the practically universal law, then surely there should be, as has already been proposed, a constitutional amendment giving Congress the power to make such a law absolutely universal, and then to enforce it.

"The other menace," Senator Cullom adds, "lies in the spirit of hierarchy, and the extent to which its influence is possible, publicly or privately controverting the laws of the land and bending them to its purposes. It is not the abstract ethics of the Mormon Church with which we have the right to come into conflict, for, as a nation, we are pledged to freedom to worship God. Every man has the inalienable right to accept the faith which pleases him and to believe what he will.

"It is not what a man believes, but the putting of his theories into practice, if they conflict with law, which rightly demands public attention and ought to receive punishment when punishment is due. If the hierarchy of the Mormon Church exists as it once existed; if it penetrates, as it once penetrated, into the affairs of citizenship; if it dictates, as it once dictated, courses of conduct at variance with the laws of the land under whose flag it claims protection and privilege—then it is a menace, and it is high time that we demanded reformation."

The Old-Time Sunday School

THE first time I ever went to Sunday School I repeated the first verse of Matthew, first chapter, to May Mason, my teacher, along with the six verses following. Every Sunday thereafter I repeated from memory the next seven verses, until the book of John was finished. Then we took up Christ's Sermon on the Mount, beginning at the fifth chapter of Matthew, until we finished that book, and so on, until we completed the New Testament. After we had all repeated our verses to our teachers, good old Mr. Kirk, our Superintendent, got up to give us a talk on the lesson, always asking us what was our motto (which was always the same), and our reply was: "Deal justly; love mercy, and walk humbly." Oh, those good old Sunday Schools have gone forever out of our land.

There was no watching the clock to see if we were using more than forty-five minutes. No, we were held interested and instructed, sometimes two hours or more. Did we get tired? Well, I should say not, and every one of that old class could give a Scripture quotation to fit most any subject that might come up.

But improvements are all the fashion, and a new fad started up, and the other churches soon followed. Memorizing stopped, and we were reduced to an hour and a half. Then there was a strike for shorter hours, and the half was taken off, and now the time is forty-five minutes, and I am looking next for a strike that will cut out the forty minutes and leave but five.

To Leave Off Coffee and Use Postum.

Postum Coffee shows its great nourishing power in many ways.

"I was nursing my baby six months ago," writes a young matron, "and I found that tea and coffee did not agree with me. I grew nervous and weak, my appetite was not good, and besides, baby was cross and fretful. He didn't seem to get proper nourishment from my milk, and friends said: 'You must wean him, he is starving.'

"I gave up tea and coffee and tried cocoa, chocolate and milk instead, but still baby didn't seem to thrive. At last, on the advice of a friend, I began to use Postum Coffee, and I can truly say that the effect was wonderful! Both baby and I began to improve in appetite, spirits and flesh immediately. In three months my boy weighed 20 pounds and he is as good a baby as a mother could wish to have. My drinking Postum did it.

"I cannot recommend Postum Food Coffee too highly to nursing mothers. It is better in flavor than the other coffee and is far superior in nutritive qualities, supply just what the child must have, as no other food can do." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason—explained in the quaint little book, "The Road to Wellville," in each pkg.

Messages of the Prophets

By Mrs. M. Baxter

HAGGAI, like all the other prophets, sees not only the near, but the far future, almost as though they were one. He sees the coming of Christ, the desire of all nations, and he sees the shaking of all nations, and the very house which is building filled with glory greater than that of the temple which had been destroyed, and "in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts." Yes, there was glory when the Son of God walked on earth and taught in that very temple, but it was a glory, which only those saw who believed on him, and in that place, Jerusalem, he did give "peace by the blood of his cross" (Col. 1: 20). But the time of the shaking of all nations is yet to come, after they that wait for Him have been gathered to their Lord.

The prophet's next message, in the ninth month, our December, calls the priests to consider the sinfulness of the people, and how that all which they offer to God is unclean (2: 10-14); how little the people responded to God (15-17), and yet the message of grace: "From this day, 24th of Kislev [Dec.], I will bless you" (18, 19). His final message was on the same day, and was addressed personally to Zerubbabel. It is very striking, and tells him that in the day when he will shake the nations, Zerubbabel will be made as a signet; "For I have chosen thee, saith the Lord."

While Haggai was delivering these messages, the Spirit of God was moving Zechariah. Between the message of Haggai 2, 9 and v. 10, in the month answering to our November, God gave Zechariah eight visions in one night (Zech. 1: 6). His first vision is of a man, the angel of the Lord, that stood among the myrtle-trees, and let the prophet know what was in his heart for Israel. Thus saith the Lord, "I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion, with great jealousy. And I am very sore displeased with the nations that are at ease; for I was but a little displeased, and they helped forward the affliction." What a true word about the dealings of the nations with Israel! And God is displeased. But this reckoning has to be paid, and the nations will yet have to give an account of how they have dealt with Israel. "The Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem" (Zech. 1: 7-17).

The second vision is of four horns or world powers (chap 6: 1-8, comp. Rev. 7: 1; Dan. 7: 2). The four horns scattered Judah, but God has resources. He has four smiths or carpenters who are to cast down the horns of the nations which scattered Judah. The third vision is of the rebuilt Jerusalem in the time of the Millennium, with the assurance of God's intense love for his people. "Whoso toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye," the most sensitive part.

The fourth vision shows us Joshua, the type of the priestly nation which Israel was intended to be (Exodus 19: 6), and which she will yet be in the Millennium (Isa. 61: 6). Joshua is clothed with filthy garments, and stands before the Angel of the Lord, and He, God the Son, who bore our sin, says: "Take away the filthy garments from him . . . I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee." God, the Father (ver 6) says: "If thou wilt keep my charge, then thou shalt also judge my house, and shalt also keep my house, and I will give thee places to walk [R. V. margin] among them that stand by." And a stone is set before Joshua, and on the one stone seven eyes (type of the Holy Spirit).

The fifth vision of the two candlesticks, with the oil continually poured in, seems to typify Israel as "the light of the world" in the Millennium, when not might, but God's Spirit, shall be the ruling power. The sixth vision of the "flying roll" typifies the judgments of an angry God upon the earth which has sinned against him.

The Truth About Stoves

By the Largest Makers of Stoves and Ranges in the World

MANY people have been deceived in believing that stoves were cheap because of a low price, when experience proves them the most expensive.

A small price may be paid for a stove which looks attractive in the catalogue, which has been described as "perfect," but it is liable to prove a very expensive purchase; for ten chances to one, trouble will arise from this stove in a month's time—it may not heat or cook properly, or it may consume fuel like a locomotive. Then the material in the stove itself may wear so poorly that at the end of a year or so it will have to be replaced.

You never get something for nothing in this world, and when you pay a small price for a stove, that price must cover the cost of material and labor, and include a reasonable profit, consequently inferior cast-iron and steel, and the cheapest and most inexperienced labor, must go into this seemingly low-priced stove.

Expert Stove Advice Free.

We have opened an "Advice Department," in charge of an expert stoveman, simply to tell the people, absolutely free of cost, all about stoves. And this expert will honestly advise you just which stove or range will best suit your needs. We also want those who have lost money on the seemingly inexpensive stove, to let us tell them how they can save money by buying a "Garland," even if the first cost is a little more than that of the cheap and unsatisfactory stove. We want them to let us tell them about the advantages of "Garland" Stoves and Ranges, which always prove a good investment.

We make a "Garland" to fit every stove need, and have books accurately describing the different kinds. We could not afford to open this "Advice Department" or send out the valuable literature we do, free of charge, if "Garland" Stoves and Ranges were not distinctly superior to other makes; if the magnitude of our operations did not make it possible for us to sell them at reasonable prices, and if our reputation and methods of doing business did not insure absolute satisfaction.

If you are considering the purchase of a stove or range, cut out this coupon, check (this way ✓) the kind of stove you are interested in, mail it to us today, and you will promptly receive our Expert Advice as to just which stove is best suited to your needs, and why, and our literature, free of charge.

Receiving our Expert Advice and literature will not put you under any obligation to buy. We simply desire the opportunity to give you the evidence of the tremendous superiority of "Garland" Stoves and Ranges, and leave the buying decision entirely with you.

In order that "Garland" Stoves and Ranges shall last, we make them of the very best materials and employ the most expert workmen in the world.

"Garland" Stoves and Ranges are durable and handsome in appearance. They are highly nickeled and each "Garland" will last a lifetime.

"Garland" Stoves and Ranges will not "burn out," but will heat and cook perfectly, and will save fuel, save repairs, save worry, save money.

We have local dealers who handle our stoves exclusively, in nearly every village, town and city in the United States. You can examine "Garlands" before you buy, instead of after. You can satisfy yourself that "Garlands" are exactly as represented. There will be no freight to pay on "Garlands" and the dealer will set them up without charge.

If no dealer in your town sells "Garlands," or you decide to buy a stove not in your local dealer's stock, you can enjoy the above advantages. We will make a special arrangement so that the stove you want will be delivered to you and properly set up ready for use in your own home.

The Written Guarantee of The Michigan Stove Company accompanies every stove, and protects you by the absolute guarantee that every "Garland" is as represented—The World's Best.

Helpful Hymns*

WHAT a list that would be, if we could have it, of the sacred songs that have helped men in the crises of their lives! Probably there is no form of literature that so clings to the memory as the hymn. The hymns that the mother sings to her child, the hymns that are the first exercises of a child's memory, often continue unforgotten into old age, and are recalled in the strangest circumstances. As a famous author says: "At this moment, on the slopes of the Rockies, or in the sweltering jungles of India, in crowded Australian city, or secluded English hamlet, the sound of some simple hymn tune will, as by mere magic spell, call from the silent grave the shadowy forms of the unforgotten dead, and transport the listener, involuntarily, over land and sea, to the scene of his childhood years, to the village school, to the parish church." The same author tells us that in the trials of his own life, which have been neither few nor small, the comfort and sustaining strength that have borne him up came from that hymn of Gilmore's, beginning:

He leadeth me! Oh blessed thought!
Oh words with heavenly comfort fraught!
Whate'er I do, where'er I be,
Still 'tis God's hand that leadeth me.

To the same category, and helpful to thousands of Christians for more than a century, belongs the well-known hymn, beginning:

Guide me, O thou great Jehovah!

And with these we may place Cardinal Newman's hymn:

Lead, Kindly Light.

Then there are hymns of stimulus and inspiration, which have been sung in moments of peril and supreme effort. They stir the soul to transports of faith and energy, and quicken to its sublimest pitch faith in the unseen Helper and Deliverer. Among such is Baring Gould's processional hymn:

Onward, Christian soldiers! marching as to war,
With the cross of Jesus, going on before.

And Watts's paraphrase of the ninetieth Psalm:

Our God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come.

Dearer, perhaps, to a greater multitude of Christians, are the hymns that speak comfort to the depressed soul. There is so much trouble in the world, that hymns of this class have a mission of far-reaching character. Of these the most famous are John Newton's:

Begone unbelief,
My Saviour is near,
And for my relief
Will surely appear.

And Mrs. Van Alstyne's beautiful hymn:

Safe in the arms of Jesus,
Safe on his gentle breast.

The less known hymn, having its origin in the sixth century, touches this strain:

Art thou weary, art thou languid,
Art thou sore distrest?
"Come to me," saith One, "and coming,
Be at rest."

With these is Mrs. Adams' famous hymn, sung in churches and homes in times of sorrow and distress; by the bedside of the dying, and in the agony of bereavement, the work of a Unitarian:

Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee!
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me.

Nor must we forget the hymn that, in a recent census of people who acknowledged their indebtedness to various hymns, received the highest number of votes:

Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee.

It would be an endless task to give the mere titles of hymns that have become precious to the people of God. It is estimated that the number of those that have attained popularity is more than half a million, and thousands more come into use every year. There are old ones, however, that will never be displaced, inspiring as the new ones are. Hymns like, "All Hail the Power of Jesus Name"; "Lo, He Comes with Clouds Descending"; "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds"; "Glory to Thee, My God, this Night," will never lose their charm. But the modern additions are precious, too, and the past century was very rich in them. Such hymns as: "Abide With Me"; "Just as I am, Without One Plea"; "My God My Father, while I stray," and Whittier's, and Bonar's contributions are immortal.

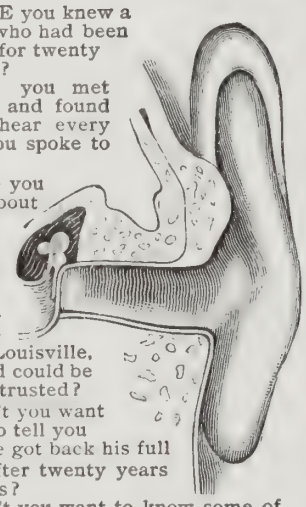
The "EAR-BOOK"
For Deaf People

By George H. Wilson

SUPPOSE you knew a man who had been Deaf for twenty years?

Suppose you met him today, and found he could hear every whisper you spoke to him?

Suppose you enquired about him, and found that he was one of the most reliable, and responsible, citizens of Louisville, whose word could be absolutely trusted?



Wouldn't you want that man to tell you just how he got back his full Hearing after twenty years of Deafness?

Wouldn't you want to know some of the things he found out about the Ear, and about Deafness, in fifteen years study of both, and of his own case?

Well,—that is just what George H. Wilson, of Louisville, Ky., tells in his 200 page "Ear Book."

Mr. Wilson is almost as well known in Louisville as Marshall Field is in Chicago, or John Wanamaker in Philadelphia.

And, he was, for twenty years, almost the Deafest man in his native city.

Any one of the thousands who know him today will certify that his Hearing is now as sharp as their own.

Few men have studied the Ear so earnestly, and thoroughly, as Mr. Wilson had to do, for his own sake.

What he positively knows about Deafness is personal, and practical.

It is not mere book knowledge, but the actual facts tested out by his own hard experience.

"The Wilson Ear Book" therefore should be read by every man or woman, who has Ear trouble,—who is Deaf, or threatened with Deafness.

This "Ear Book" will be sent Free to any Doctor, or other person, who will clip out this advertisement and send us, with it, the name and address of one Deaf Person in his locality. Address—

The Wilson E. D. Company, 45 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

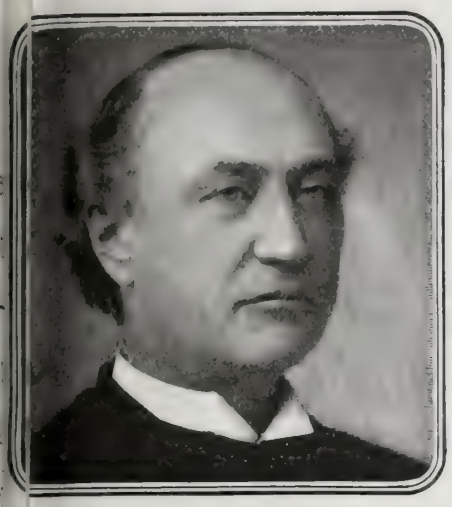
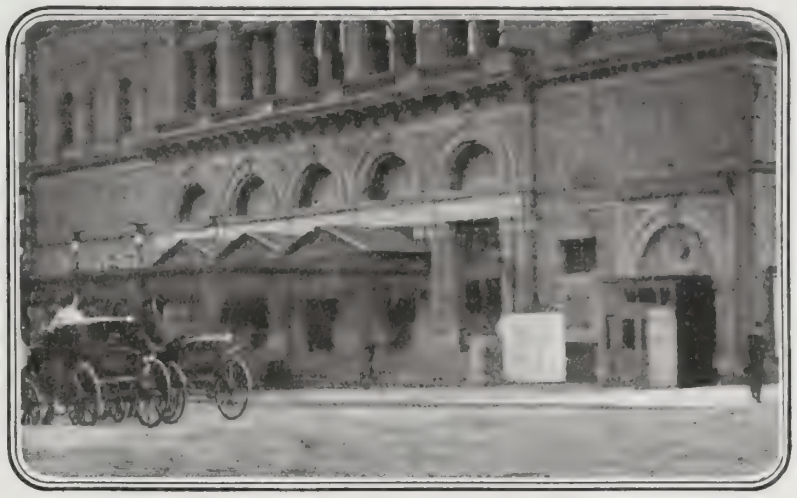
Justice David J. Brewer



Entrance to Carnegie Hall, where the Conference Meets



Justice John M. Harlan

The Coming Inter-Church Conference

NEVER before in the history of Christianity in our country has there been a meeting so hopeful and so significant as that which is to be held in Carnegie Hall, New York, on November 15 to continue till November 21. It is to be an assembly of delegates from the various Protestant Churches, to establish a basis for co-operation in Christian work. Preliminary meetings with the same object in view were held in New York in 1900, and in Washington, D. C., in 1902. But this is the first time that the movement has been organized on so large a scale. It is expected that the delegates will number over five hundred, and will represent churches that have an aggregate membership of nearly twenty millions.

As has been explained in previous articles in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there is no expectation or desire of effecting a union of the churches on creedal or governmental lines. The autonomy of the churches is not menaced. It cannot be expected that men will surrender the distinctive doctrines of their communions, or accept the government of any ecclesiastical body but their own. The principles of doctrine and of church government are too dear, and too hallowed by association to be given up by any denomination. The members remember the struggles of their fathers to organize the individual churches, the suffering they bore, and the sacrifices they cheerfully made, that there should be an organized community representing the phase of truth which they believed to be essential and divine. The Congregationalist would not accept the polacy of the Protestant Episcopal Church; the Baptist would not consent to administer the ordinance by sprinkling; the Presbyterian would not accept the Arminian creed. But all believe in Christ, all depend on him for salvation, and preach his Gospel as the panacea for all human ills.

Agreeing on the fundamental doctrines, forming the great bulwark against the tides of sin and corruption that threaten to overwhelm humanity, cannot they unite in defensive and aggressive action? They all seek the moral and spiritual welfare of the nation and the world, can they not make their influence more effective if it is exerted in unison, than if they held aloof from one another? On the questions of the Desecration of the Lord's Day, on Marriage and Divorce, on the problem of Immigration, on Child Labor and all the great subjects that affect the moral well-being of the country, the churches are in accord, but their voice is so broken and divided in its utterance that it has no effect. Uttered in unison through recognized channels, it would be heard with respect by Legislatures and executive officers. Then, too, there is the problem of evangelization. Would it not be possible to avoid the evil results of denominational rivalry in certain fields, and the lack of organized service in neglected districts? Money is wasted now in the duplication of machinery, which, under one representative board, might do more effective work. In short, cannot some plan be formed for bringing the churches into fraternal comradeship in the service of Christ? This question has been answered affirmatively on the other side the Atlantic by the union of the Free Churches. Here, where the need is greater, little has been done. In New York, Ohio, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Michigan and New Jersey, a beginning has been made. Local and State federations have been organized, and a demonstration has been made that union is possible and advantageous. At the meeting of delegates in Washington in 1902, the reports were so encouraging that a committee was appointed to present the results to the Christian Churches of the whole country. The suggestions of the committee commended themselves to at least seventeen denominations, which, through their elective bodies, have appointed delegates to attend the Conference in New York and discuss practical plans.

Bishop E. G. Andrews (M.E.)

Rev. J. Cleveland Cady, Chairman

Rev. W. H. Roberts, D.D.

As will be seen by the programme of the meetings printed elsewhere, the addresses cover every department of the field, and their presentation is confided to men eminent in their respective denominations. Opportunity is to be afforded for discussion and suggestion, so that a wise and practical basis can be reached for effective work. Very discreetly, the Committee presents no plan of its own, but leaves to the delegates the management of the organization. The first question to be decided is whether a National Federation is practicable, and if so, on what basis, and with what powers it should be invested. The nucleus once formed it will be easy to discover on what lines it can operate, and what development it will be wise to make. There are many subjects on which all the denominations agree, and these will, of course, form the material for the first campaign. As it proceeds, and the value of its action is demonstrated, a larger field will come under its control, and further powers will be confided to it.

Every city, every village, has an interest in this movement. It rests with Christian men everywhere to

The Sound of Many Waters

TEXT: Rev. 1: 15:

"As the sound of many waters"

OF all the New Testament writers, the Apostle John most frequently causes us to pause and contemplate Christ; only to one end, to believe in him and to love him. Occupying the choice seat at the table, John feasted his eyes and ears and heart upon the Lord; and, in his writings, he would have his readers attain the same position.

"The Word was made flesh," he says dramatically in his Gospel, "and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

To corroborate his ardent words, he introduces John the Baptist. "This is he of whom I spake," says the Baptist, "He that cometh after me is preferred before me; for he was before me; and out of his fullness have we received grace for grace. For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ."

It is "glory," "grace" and "truth," all that is lovable and inspiring that John would have us see in Jesus Christ. He is the "rose of Sharon, the lily of the valley, the all-together lovely."

The Voice of the Waters

In his Epistles, where he speaks of the glories that the wonderful love of God will reveal in the faithful, John's triumphant description is, "we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is." With his eyes and ears and soul, John realized the truth, the grace, the glory that there was in Christ. "To be like him," was his ambition; and "to be like him" was to John the greatest and most wonderful promise that could be made to those who loved God.

Then in this wonderful book, called his "Revelation," we have his delineation of the glorified Christ, in the midst of the golden candlesticks. In all this description, there is nothing more beautiful than John's reference to the voice of our Lord, "as the sound of many waters."

While rowing on bay or river, or drifting, while the wavelets are gurgling at the keel, we speak of the sweet music and the thrill inspired by those bubbling sounds. It is the music of many waters. Poets have listened to the pattering brooks, the plash of the oars, the gurgle at the keel, and the lapping of the waves, and have tried to catch their music, music sweet and thrilling. So John in his endeavor to make us perceive that in Christ dwelt that which was pure and lovable, that which was exquisitely beautiful and most attractively inspiring; he drew our attention to the voice of our Lord, mellow and sweet and thrilling "as the sound of many waters."

Reveals Character

Our voice is our means of communication. By it the heart speaketh. By its full notes, and quavers and demi-semi-quavers, it proclaims to the knowing ones exactly what we are. Bright, light-hearted boyhood and girlhood have their high, ringing, merry voices. But manhood, tried of men, in the contests of life, steadied by intelligence and faith, has its deeper, sterner, fuller notes. And delicate womanhood, with heart of love often suffering, and feet wearied with caring for the sick, and mind exercised over the sinning, but withal, full of hope and love, has her voice made rich with the lower, sweeter tones. While querulous, pessimistic old age, pipes its shrill, complaining notes, trying the nerves of all who hear.

There is the quick, blatant voice, which tells of shallow intelligence and quick temper; the unsteady voice that proclaims instability of mind; and there is the quiet, steady voice, against which Satan has wrought his arts in vain; for that voice only bears the words of love, of kindness, and of helpfulness. Who does not covet such a voice? The singer, to take the high notes of the scale; the orator, to master the rich chest tones, so dear to the hearer, will spend years in practice and much treasure in instruction to perfect his or her art. In the battle of life, with its earnest communion with God in prayer, battling with the flesh, yielding to the Spirit, rejoicing in hope and triumphant in love, the voices of God's saints have attained their sweetest and most attractive notes and thereby have proclaimed their beautiful characters to men.

* Preached at Port Carling, Ontario, Canada.

In picturing to us the perfection of the character of Christ, the Apostle John makes no mistake when he refers to Christ's voice, so musical and so attractive, "as the sound of many waters."

No other voice ever uttered words of wisdom to surpass or even to equal those of our Lord. His words were pure, ennobling and divine. His beatitudes have music so exquisite that the most saintly soul is but entering into the true appreciation of it; the parables have homely wisdom that the poorest, lowest sinner can grasp. The ethics of Christ are the purest and his philosophy is the most comprehensive. But far transcending the teachings that pertain alone to earth, he taught us to look into the future life. Death was by him transformed from a terror, who brought to a full stop the energies of mind and soul, to a humble messenger of God, to usher his children from their temporary abodes, their probation on earth, to the mansions Christ himself had but gone before to prepare, the more permanent dwelling-place of the blest.

His voice had the quiet confidence of authority. Other voices, in spite of the great wisdom of their owners, have at one time or another halted, hesitated in doubt, trembled in uncertainty, but Christ's never. He taught, not as the Scribes or Pharisees, "but as one having authority." Coming from above, he but spoke the things whereof he knew. Knowledge is the root of authority.

The Expression of Love

But his mind was not alone full of the wisdom of heaven; his heart was the heart of the God of love. And his voice and deeds, his every-day life expressed this love. No other life ever exhibited such strength. Yet it was strength used, not as the strength of most men for the aggrandizement of self, but for the smiting of wrong and the uplifting of weakness. The hungry he fed; the sick he healed; and dead ones were restored by his power to their friends. The women and the children clung to him, charmed by the sweetest voice they ever heard, the voice that said: "Suffer the children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." The poor and the burdened found in him their friend. He, who could thunder those terrible "woes" upon those who created needless burdens for their fellows, could woo the oppressed to trust their burdens to him. "Come unto me," he said, "all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

His voice was the voice of the sinless one—pure as the stream of the crystal fountain; but he knew the depth of human sin, the havoc of iniquity. Although his knowledge was omniscient, Christ did not speak as the Pharisees would have him, to expose the sin and crush the sinner; no, he spoke with a richness, fullness and tenderness that not only exhibited to the sinner his true appreciation of his sinful heart, but awakened in that heart, deadened by sin, a hope, an aspiration, a prayer. This, under the power of that voice, ripened from timid surprise and tearful repentance to faith—and there was thus made a new creature in Christ Jesus. Oh, to master the tones of the voice that said: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" The voice that put an end to argument in the mind of the greatest of earth's theological debaters; that brought a flood of light to the most earnest of human souls; that checked in his mad career the most determined of men. Yes, and out of the bitterness of hatred and bigotry, brought forth the sweetness of faith, self-sacrifice and love.

A Voice of Power

Oh, those ringing tones of Jesus' voice! Would that his followers could catch their notes! Then there would be greater success in the words of truth as they are proclaimed from teacher's seat and pulpit desk. These are the notes that the hearts of men are dying to hear. These are the tones that the witnesses to the truth must master if they are to be "fishers of men."

But as we listen more intently to the voice of Jesus, a richer note is sounded that reverberates in our innermost being—a note that mellows and awes, as it moves us! Whence came that note so sad and yet so ...tivating; so weird with a sense of the most abject l...liness, and yet so soul-purifying, so inspiring and ...ll-exalting?

Mark the path our Saviour trod. It was made r...ed by the steady desertion of his followers. FIGHTING SIN ON THE BOWERY

GOD has blessed us in the grand and noble fight with Satan on the Bowery, that great highway to hell. We have carved out of the throng of homeless drunkards, thieves, and outcasts enough redeemed material to start a very fair church so far as membership goes.

The picture presented to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers is composed of twelve converts of the Mission, gathered by the shepherdess who sits among them, who has been a missionary and visitor to them since the beginning of their new life till now. Sister Cora, who is sometimes called "The Angel of the Bread Line," is the only woman the writer ever knew who goes to minister to that great throng of starving and homeless men who form what is known as "Fleischman's Bread Line," gathering at the corner of Broadway and Tenth Street every night in the year. As the clocks strike the hour of midnight, each poor fellow gets a half loaf of bread, and then hies himself away to some park bench to eat it, or if the night be cold, he munches the bread as he paces his lonely, toilsome journey along the deserted streets the long night through.

Sister Cora, and a Group of Converts of the Wesley Rescue Mission

One of the fine bright-looking men in the photograph came out of this very bread-line while he was drunk, in answer to an invitation by Cora. Some of these redeemed men never had their pictures taken before, except possibly for the "Rogues' Gallery." Look closely at the illustration and see if you do not think that rescue work pays. Many pictures like this could be taken were we able to get the boys together — pictures of men just as useful and bright as these. In each one of these pictured faces one may behold striking evidence of "the new creature in Christ Jesus." Each man is a member of the M. E. Church, and each Sunday he sits under the inspiring teaching of the beloved pastor of old John Street Church, Rev. Dr. J. Wesley Johnston. Out of his own earnings, meagre though they may be, he unfailingly puts something on the plate to support the Lord's work.

This Mission at Wesley Rescue Hall on the Bowery, was started, and has been carried on, by the City Church Extension and Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, Rev. Dr. F. M. North, secretary, Mr. S. W. Bowne, president. It was the first move of this kind, I believe, ever started in New York by the Methodist Church.

When Wesley Rescue Hall opened its doors at 293 Bowery one year ago last March, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD not only gave it recognition in its columns, but the owner and proprietor of the greatest religious journal, Dr. Louis Klopsch, visited us, and contributed liberally to our start. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been since then the helpful channel of conveying several gifts from kind readers.

S. H. HADLEY.

A Great Ohio Camp Meeting

THE Highland Park Camp Meeting Association was organized in Ohio, in 1897, with Rev. S. E. Rife of Akron, as its first President, and Rev. W. J. Harpster as Secretary. This Association is composed of ministers and laymen of the United Evangelical Church in the State of Ohio. In the month of August 1905, the ninth annual camp meeting was held under its auspices, on the Camp grounds located on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, between the cities of Akron and Canton, O.

The meeting was under the leadership of the efficient Presiding Elder, Rev. W. W. Sherrick, of Akron, O. Daily Bible studies were conducted by Bishop H. B. Hartzler, D.D., of Harrisburg, Pa., beginning with a series of studies on prayer, as follows:

1. The power of united intercessory prayer. 2. Christians as the Lord's remembrancers. 3. A ministry of intercession, as the privilege and duty of all Christians. 4. Encouragements and specific promises to prayer. 5. Hindrances to effectual prayer. Among the hindrances to prayer, the following were considered:

a. Unrepented sin; b. Unforgiving and unreconciled spirit; c. Pride, self-seeking and vanity; d. Self-will and self-indulgence; e. Doubt and vacillation; f. Ingratitude and want of appreciation; g. Unfaithfulness in service and neglect of means; h. Want of earnestness, importunity and perseverance; i. Ignorance of the word and will of God; j. Direct Satanic opposition.

All of these studies were helpful to the multitudes who participated in them. A number of prayer and praise services were held each day. The preaching of the Word was forceful and thoroughly evangelical, aiming at the conviction and conversion of the sinner, the sanctification of the believer, and the glorification of God. Thousands who participated in these services were greatly strengthened and edified.

The organization is more hopeful than ever, and is in a position to do more effective work in the future.

Highland Park Camp Grounds are ten miles north of Canton, O., the home of the late Pres. McKinley. The attendance from both Akron and Canton was large, and one Sabbath it was over ten thousand. ANSWERED PRAYERS

M., Kansas. "I was heavy burdened, and the Lord has answered my prayers. I wish to add my testimony to his goodness and mercy."

F. W., New York. "I am a firm believer in prayer. At present I am in deep distress, but am praying, and have faith God will hear and answer."

C. G., New York. "This is my testimony and acknowledgment: In 'my distress I cried unto the Lord, and he heard me,' and answered my prayer."

M. M. B., Nebraska, desires to add her testimony to those of the "Answered Prayer" column. He has had several direct answers to prayer in the last year. "I will be with him in trouble."

W., Vermont. "I know that God does hear and answer prayer. I was a slave to strong drink and tobacco. But I was shown that I was a sinner, and that I must be cleansed by the blood of the Lamb. I cried to God for mercy. He heard and answered my prayer, and to-day I am living for God, and have no desire for liquor or tobacco."

D. A. N., Pennsylvania. "God positively answers prayer. He has answered mine in a special manner. May he increase our faith in his promises."

H. L. F., Illinois. "Many times in the last forty-five years I have had abundant proof that God does hear and answer prayer.

"Unto my troubled heart there comes
A season of relief
When prayerfully I lift my eyes
To Him who knows my grief.
His precious promises I plead
And on Him cast my care:
The brightest hour of all the day
Is that I spend in prayer."

N. B., Canada. "God does hear and answer prayer. I asked him to relieve me of a great burden and he has done so, and also blessed me more abundantly than I could ask or think."

M. B., New York. "'Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee' has been my happy experience. My dear Heavenly Father gave more than I dared expect or ask for."

Mrs. E. J. H., North Carolina. "I believe in answer to prayer. My little girl was sick and I asked God to restore her to health, and she is better, and I believe God answers prayer."

Mrs. E. G. R., Mich. "I know of a truth that God has been good to me in my old age. How wonderfully he has fulfilled his promises. I am still trusting him every day, every hour."

A New Subscriber, writes in earnest and pathetic little appeal for the prayers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, for a profane husband and father, and for the conversion of her three boys and one girl, that they may all become true Christians, and adds, "There has not been a man of God in our house for over two years."

A. B., Virginia. "Often, when suffering, have I gone to Him, and He has heard me and comforted me."

Mrs. F. R., Michigan. "The dear Lord has answered my prayers many times. When we come to him in faith he will answer."

Mrs. R. H., California. "Having received much help from the 'Answered Prayers' column, would like to add my testimony that He heard and answered my prayer when no human help was possible."

Mrs. M. M. A., Pennsylvania. "I called on the Lord in my trouble and he heard and answered my prayers, for which I am truly thankful. God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble."

L. T., New Jersey. "I had trouble so heavy that there was no one on earth could help me, so I took this burden to the Lord and he heard and answered my prayer, and entirely help came to me. I know God does hear and answer prayer, if we pray in earnest and have faith."

strengthen the hands of the representatives of the Christian faith, who will be empowered to speak in their behalf. The idea is to get together, in order that the influence rightly belonging to the followers of Christ may have its full weight in the nation. The expression of opinion on the part of a single denomination is despised by the politicians, but it will not be safe to hold in contempt a voice that represents twenty millions of consecrated people. When the president of a federation utters his voice on behalf of righteous principles, when he protests against any public policy, the fact that he is the accredited representative of so large a constituency will give a weight to his utterances that it will not be safe to ignore. We look for great results from this movement, affecting not only righteous legislation, but the action of executive officers in all our States.

Too long have the followers of Christ been divided. The enemy has carried things with a high hand, confident that he will win an easy victory in the face of a divided and unorganized opposition. Political parties have been carefully and effectively organized; secret societies have had their unions; business interests have united in their trusts, and all have learned how much is gained by union and co-operation; but the Christian, whose religion is more to him than political or social ties, has not combined with his brother of another denominational field in the campaign for righteousness. To stand together, to act through organized channels, is the way to victory, and that way may be opened by a loyal support of a federation of the churches, which the approaching Conference may institute. After all, the world is divided into only two classes. Character is the dividing line, more clearly marked than the division between rich and poor. It is time that the right and the true take their places honestly and firmly on the one side, and demand that the principles of Christ shall rule in this nation. This can be done only when the demand is made by a recognized head.

Besides all this, there is a grand significance in this Conference that must not be overlooked. It is the open demonstration of the fundamental union existing beneath the divisions of the Christian church. Here are Episcopalians and Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians, Baptists and Lutherans, meeting together, not to dispute, but as brethren, to work together for the advancement of the kingdom of their common Lord. The differences that separate them — conscientious differences though they are — weigh far less than the bond that unites them in love and loyalty to Jesus. The Conference of so many delegates of different creeds is an avowal of comradeship in service. "All ye are brethren," is a fact to be demonstrated in the Conference, and it will be a spectacle to which the world may well give heed. It is an approach, far too long delayed, to the fulfilment of our Lord's prayer: "That they all may be one."

NEW JERSEY WOMEN OPPOSE SMOOT

THE old adage, "The king says I will," might well in this age and country read "The queen says I will." The home is the American woman's realm. She rules over it with absolute sway, and what she wishes, well—it is pretty safe to say—she will get. It is the chivalry of American men that has given the women of our land their enviable place among the women of the world—a place that those not born beneath the "starry banner" can scarcely understand.

A Spaniard once said to me, "The American women have too much—" he hesitated, failing to grasp the English word, as he had its higher meaning, and then added, "libertad." An Englishman confessed that the American husband was a puzzle to him, because he did not attempt to control the movements of his wife. A Frenchman has hinted that in his country men would think it unwise to repose the implicit confidence in their wives and daughters that American men place in theirs. How often in the Far East, when I have seen an Oriental followed—for they would not dare to walk beside him—by his several wives, have I blessed heaven for the status of American women! Confidence in woman and her influence make the American home what it is—world-renowned for its virtue and its moral atmosphere. Take these away and the whole structure falls.

The thinking people of our country—the real men and women, appreciate the importance of character. In short, the American people stand for right living and right doing. They realize that the moral growth of the country depends upon the purity of individual life. Just now the women of the United States see in the presence of a Mormon Apostle in the United States Senate, a menace to the home, and from the hearthstones in every corner of the land thousands are raising their voices as a single voice in protest against the polyg mous practices that belong to Mormonis which, while its power is principally co fined to but one State, is nevertheles stealthily extending its influence into oth States, and, like the eight-armed cuttle-fis reaching out its ugly fangs to seize t unwary. But the women of our land s "No!" with myriad voices, and, headed THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, they are eager joining the campaign against Mormonis that sanctions polygamy. Whole clu will fall in line, and I have confidence th my native State will do her part, and th the women of New Jersey will lend the names and influence to the cause.

The Picturesque Y. M. C. A. Reading Room

Y. M. C. A. Organizer DeRoos Visiting the Camps

Y. M. C. A. in the Philippines

THE old truth that any great achievement is accomplished only by a proportionately great effort, is being exemplified to-day in the work being done at the various constabulary stations in Cavite Bosque, Island of Luzon, in the Philippines, by a branch of the International Y. M. C. A. under the personal direction of Mr. A. B. DeRoos.

I write these lines because I happen to be in a position to see the good effects of the Y.M.C.A. work out in the Cavite Bosque, and I think some reader will be interested to know an American Constabulary Medical Officer's opinion. Traveling about through the ladrone and outlaw infested Cavite Province, on my tours of medical inspection I have had many opportunities to observe the results in the different native communities. My conclusion is emphatically that they are "fine business" as is the expression out here for that which is exceptionally good and beneficial. The native soldiers enjoy attending the meetings. They avail themselves of the recreation facilities, checker and domino games, English Reader books, phonograph music, gymnasium, bath, and at the Y.M.C.A. "canteen" they are able to buy many small necessities in the way of clothing and a few different kinds of food. Throughout the hours of each day, when the soldiers are at leisure, many of them will be seen spending their time enjoying the benefits and recreation facilities offered by the Association.

That this getting in touch with this American-fashioned rendezvous aids the soldier in the better performance of his duties, and the taking of more pride and interest in his work, is illustrated by incidents that occur in the soldier life of almost every passing day. One such instance will suffice for example: Recently a number of native Constabulary soldiers at one of the Y.M.C.A. stations, Buena Vista, Cavite Province, were not keeping themselves as neat and "spick and span" in their dress and equipment as was possible. A number of the most active soldier workers and enthusiastic friends of the Y.M.C.A. among the soldier detachment, got their laggard comrades to one side, and by quiet persuasion and talking induced them to see the error of their careless ways, and to improve in their military habits. They changed at once, and not only was their morale elevated and strengthened, but also the tone of efficiency of the entire Constabulary Company at Buena Vista was decidedly raised. While perhaps the entire cause of this improvement in the spirit of the soldiers was not wholly due to the associations and the teachings and kindly memories of the branch, yet much of their increased esprit de corps had undoubtedly its roots in the Y.M.C.A. of Buena Vista.

Not only are the good, stimulating effects noticeable among the soldiers for whom the Y.M.C.A. is primarily intended, but the Filipinos themselves in several of the barracks where a Y.M.C.A. branch is established are beginning to beautify their heretofore dirty yards. They endeavor to outdo even the efforts of the Cavite Bosque Secretary, Mr. A. B. DeRoos, in his beautifying the grounds and quarters of his different branches with banana trees, bushes, vines. They have arranged tastefully draped flags, bunting and flowers within his native bamboo shack Y.M.C.A. quarters. Hundreds of natives and soldiers who never knew any of the fine American hymns and tunes before, now may be heard whistling, humming, or often singing one or two they have learned since the advent of the Association in the Philippine provinces. All in all, if the best test of the worth of the work in the different constabulary garrisons of the Cavite Bosque were to be applied, and suddenly all the Y.M.C.A. branches removed entirely, there would be a decided feeling of regret and disappointment among the soldiers and hundreds of natives who have been learning their value, and how to enjoy what they offer.

As an educational influence on the Filipino and the native constabulary soldier, the Y.M.C.A., under Mr. DeRoos' leadership, is emphatically a powerful one morally, and to some extent physically and mentally.

Chinese Christian Endeavorers

IN striking contrast to the warlike scenes witnessed but a short distance away, was the peaceful gathering that took place a short time ago at Ningpo, China. It was the sixth Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies to which delegates came from all parts of China. It was a scene of great delight to the missionaries present, for, at the opening, we discovered an intellectual development and spiritual growth on the part of the Chinese converts since the last Convention, that was an inspiration to all.

One steamer carried from Shanghai about fifty foreigners and two hundred Chinese. This fact proved the wisdom of the Ningpo Christians in transforming the large college playground into a beautiful reception hall, with a seating capacity of two thousand. The bamboo supports were covered with evergreen, and from the cross-pieces hung beautiful large and small lanterns, such as only Orientals can make, and more than fifty beautiful Christian Endeavor banners of varied patterns.

Thirteen hundred delegates were present at the opening meeting. Fourteen of the eighteen provinces of China were represented. There were, also, a Korean and a Japanese. It was inspiring during the roll-call, when each delegate came to the front when a town or district was named, and presented the greetings of his own society, and, oftentimes, of several others, and briefly gave the main features of the work. One delegate was quite a small lad, who represented a junior society. He mounted the platform, and read his report with all the composure of his elders. One young man reported that the contributions of his society had all been expended in buying and sending Bibles and Testaments to the Japanese, "Because," said he, "if they fought our battles, it is only fair that we should send them Bibles and Testaments."

The last to respond was Dr. Ohlinger, who said with much feeling: "Dr. Clarke started Christian Endeavor in America within the last quarter of a century, and Dr. Hubbard, of Foochow, twenty-one years ago organized the first Christian Endeavor Society outside of America, in Foochow. Now Christian Endeavor encircles the globe."

Some of the Speakers at the C. E. Convention in China

A large number of Chinese speakers showed well trained minds, as well as consecrated hearts. They were invaluable as interpreters for the missionaries, so quickly did they grasp and express the spiritual thought of the speaker.

Rev. George Lyon, of the Y.M.C.A., who has great aptitude for teaching young men the Bible, was invited to give an object lesson to a small class of selected Chinese, that they might grasp the idea, and each one be able to pass it on to others. In spite of the early morning hour a great crowd assembled. It was evident that the Lord was present to bless the multitude; and those faithful Chinese who attended those early meetings will live nearer to the Master and proclaim the Gospel more effectively than ever before.

Torrential rains did not keep the Chinese from the Sunday services. The native schools were out in full ranks, as they had been on other days, notwithstanding the rain fell constantly and abundantly through the temporary roofing. When one's heart is all right, it is astonishing how much physical discomfort one can endure.

The friendly attitude of the Ningpo Chinese officials, was very gratifying. The four highest in rank accepted the invitation to the reception given to the "Endeavorers," by the people of Ningpo. They came with their usual pomp and ceremony, and were delightfully cordial and friendly to all. Three of them attended the evening service, and after closely following the exercises, each made a short speech, approving of "the good words they had heard."

But their attention did not end here. They privately ascertained the hour when all the foreign members of the Convention, ladies included, could assemble for a Chinese feast they wished to give us. Their dainty invitations were sent to all; there was practically universal acceptance, and everybody said that it was the most delightful function they had ever known.

The Shanghai Endeavorers, foreign and native, can never forget the beautiful picture they looked upon from the deck on that perfect May afternoon, when they left Ningpo; the pier and shore crowded with Chinese Endeavorers, singing their Convention hymns, and, in the background on an elevation, the Chinese officials in full regalia and retinue on white ponies.

Four days were passed so near the Heavenly Gate, that our souls were lifted to a higher plane, where we realized that things "unseen" by mortal eyes are more real and attainable than all this world can offer.

A Missionary Problem

IN view of the rapid development of industrial training as a branch of foreign missionary effort, the interview with Mr. H. W. Fry, which appears in another part of this issue, possesses a very special and timely interest for missionaries and mission supporters generally.

Speaking as one who has had a most extensive experience in industrial work, Mr. Fry is to be regarded as an authority on the subject, and his observations and conclusions deserve to receive due consideration. The chief point he makes is that, up to a certain stage, the elementary industrial training of children of proper age can be successfully conducted under mission auspices; but beyond this, and when the self-supporting stage is reached, the mission should cease to be a factor in the case, and should not enter the commercial, competitive struggle, which could be better conducted under separate auspices. His is the view of an expert in commercial as distinguished from missionary industrialism. He evidently believes that the spiritual side of missionary work cannot successfully be harnessed with the purely commercial side, and that one or both must inevitably suffer in consequence.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be pleased to have its missionary readers express their views on this question. We give Mr. Fry's observations, because they are certain to awaken widespread interest, and to induce those workers in the foreign field to present the "other side," which we have no doubt will not lack able advocates.

Concerning Angels

VERY singular, in this prosaic and sceptical age, is the discussion which is now agitating two circles of New York society. It is separating clerical critics from the authorities on art. The question is, whether the sculptor who represents angels as women, is true to fact. It arose in an examination of the figures in the new Cathedral of St. John the Divine. They are exceedingly beautiful in face and form, but unmistakably feminine. A student of the Bible, seeing them, took no exception to their artistic beauty, but asked how it was that the sculptor had chosen the feminine form, when all that we know of angels from the Bible, indicated that angels were masculine. The sculptor quoted mediæval precedents as justification for his treatment, but his clerical critic contended that the only valid authority was the Bible, and there, not a single instance can be found of the angel having been a woman.

The question is interesting, but not of real importance. We do not go to sculpture for our theology, nor would there be any serious harm done by the sculptor's conception in this case. He is naturally concerned about the artistic beauty of his work, and there can be no question of the female form lending itself better than the masculine to his purpose. If, however, the design is to be true to revelation, he must acknowledge that he has erred. Indeed, the criticism might go further. Where is the authority for the wings with which the figures are supplied? It is true that the seraphim whom Isaiah saw had six wings, and that the angel who visited Daniel said he had been caused to fly very swiftly; but in other descriptions of the heavenly messengers, they are represented as having the ordinary human form. The angels whom Abraham entertained in his tent appeared as men, took people by the hand, and ate with them. The angel who wrestled with Jacob appeared as a man; the angels who watched by Christ's empty sepulchre are described as looking like young men, and in other instances the form was apparently wingless.

The fact appears to be that angels are a distinct creation—messengers sent from God to deliver his message, or execute his behests. We may safely conclude that they are endowed with natures adapted to the work they have to perform. That some of them must have the feminine nature, seems reasonable. All the qualities we associate with woman — her gentleness, sweetness, and tenderness, would be needed by the angels of ministration and consolation, who are as active as angels of vengeance and destruction. It is not a question of form, but of nature and disposition. There are women in this world who are beloved, not for their beauty of face or figure, but for their angelic natures. They are so pure and spiritual, that all thought of sex in relation to them seems a profanation, and so it must be with the angels. God's methods in his nearer presence we suppose are like his methods here, and he prepares for his errands beings fitted for them by nature, irrespective of form.

The real clue we have to the nature of angels is that which Christ himself furnishes. When the Sadducees, who did not believe in angels or spirits, came to him with a question about the status of a woman in the resurrection, Jesus waived the problem aside with a reply that is significant in this connection. He intimated that as spirits, the whole question of sex was in abeyance. In spiritual natures there is nothing fleshly or gross, but, partaking of the nature of God himself, they rise superior to our human nature; all the distinctions with which we are familiar disappear in the spiritual life, and Christ is all and in all.

The Men and Reed Smoot

AMID the many good enterprises in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its broad-minded Christian proprietor have been engaged, I don't know of any more worthy than the campaign against polygamy. God send the women victory in their battle for the removal of Reed Smoot, the hierarchy's sworn apostle, who is clearly out of place in the United States Senate, where his Mormon oath, his affiliations, his predilection, and his Mormon interests generally, render it impossible that he could serve the American people acceptably.

Now, why cannot the men turn to and aid the women in this campaign for honor and morality? My wife and two daughters have worked like beavers in this movement, and have rolled up a great list of names to swell the grand total of signers to the Women's Memorial; but their enthusiastic work makes me feel ashamed of my own idleness. How can I best help them?

Covington, Ky. J. E. D.

Our correspondent's inquiry is opportune. Some time ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, replying to several letters, stated that the time would soon arrive when the husbands, sons, fathers and brothers of the women who are now so brilliantly conducting the movement for the removal of the Mormon Apostle from the Senate, could do them a real service.

That time is now at hand. All men who have at heart the welfare of the American home, the honor of American womanhood, and the integrity of American institutions, can now render signal service to the cause for which the women are fighting, by adopting this suggestion:

> Write to the United States Senators from your State, urging them to vote to exclude Reed Smoot, on the grounds stated in the Women's Memorial, viz.: That the Mormon hierarchy has broken its sacred covenant with the United States and gone back to polygamy; that it defies State and national laws; that it is disloyal, and that its apostle should be removed from the Senate and have no further voice in making laws for this nation.

Write this letter now, stamp, address, and mail it to your Senator, at Washington, and it will surely reach his hands in due season, and will have a mighty influence in producing the results for which every good woman in this nation is now praying and working.

The Right Aim in Life

WE recently read of a well-known author who put these words in the mouth of one of his characters: "His ambition was to earn enough money to live like a gentleman." We at once think how selfish, how unworthy this ambition, when there is so much work to be done on this earth of ours for the benefit of our fellow-men, work that meets us on every hand. Yet when we stop to think of it, a large portion of our population is working by day and racking its brains by night with money getting for the sole object. Their horizon is indeed bounded by the ash barrels, with never a glimpse "over the hills and far away," to slightly change an expression of Jacob Riis.

These people are not truly happy. They usually worry themselves out of this world into the next, where, to the best information we have, their knowledge of the stock market will be a useless art. If every one for generations past had gone on this plan of all for self, nothing for the community, we would still be r ning the woods, clad in goatskins, cutting down tree and, perchance, the passer-by, with a stone hatchet. very little act of kindness, every use of the helping and, must have increased with compound interest to ring our civilization to its present high standard.

People such as the late Dr. Barnardo, the l Dr. Cullis, and Miss Haswell, the missionary, who ha pent forty years in Burma, and others, have found i their life of service the true aim in life and true hap ess. It is with great satisfaction, a sense of relief, th one turns from the picture of the rushing crowd, insar with greed, to that presented by such lives as these lives superbly consecrated. Not that it is at all nec sary for us to found schools for fifty thousand waifs, or end our days in a foreign land, but here at home we c re move some stone from the roadway, so that tho who come after us will find the path easier and be gla that we have lived. The doer of "little things" f his fellows will see that his life has been worth while hen he finds his own journey is drawing to a close, a his hair is touched with the first glory of the sunset.

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Disorganized Morocco

HOW essential it is that some strong Power take hold of Morocco, and reorganize its government, becomes more apparent every day. Although the Algerian subject of France whom the Maghzen had seized, has been released, and the crisis averted for the time, the tension continues, and the internal disorder increases. An eminent statesman, summing up the situation, says: "There are incessant insurrections in the empire; a pretender always in arms, and superior to the Sultan in military power; foreigners are molested; the treasury empty European creditors more ready to provoke a conflict than an agreement; a horde of Mussulmans hostile to foreign ideas and to foreigners, and ministers who resist the reforms which their master proclaims himself eager to adopt! If European diplomats come to an agreement to reform Morocco, will they not meet with opposition in Morocco itself?"

That the coming Conference will remedy the difficulty, is improbable. Nothing will reform the government; the only hope is in extinction and the substitution of a firm and strong administration, possibly with the Sultan as a figure-head, as in Egypt. It is, however, a relief to learn that Germany and France have avoided the conflict which appeared to be impending, and have come to an agreement about the Conference. Germany has undertaken "not to follow aims opposed to French interests, and recognizes the right of France to police the frontier between Morocco and Algeria." With these points conceded, the Conference is free to deal with Morocco and prevent, if possible, its disorder overflowing into Algeria and other contiguous countries.

What measures it may take for the correction of misgovernment in the internal affairs, cannot be predicted. The scandals in the affairs of the country are open and base. The slave trade is openly conducted. A recent visitor saw the market which he sketched in the accompanying illustration. The auctioneer opened the sale with a prayer to Allah, and then led each lot through the market among the wealthy slave-merchants seated around, and received the bids as he passed. Meanwhile the men in authority take no measures to repress the evil and are believed, from the Sultan downward, to participate in its profits. Now, as in ancient times, the corruption passes through every rank.

The wicked walk on every side, when the vilest men are exalted (Ps. 12: 8).

Scene in the Open Slave Market in Morocco City

Robed of a Crown

The police of Chicago and other cities are searching for a crown, said to have been stolen by burglars in Dublin, Ireland. It is believed that the burglars have brought their booty to this country in the hope of finding a safe market for it. The burglary was committed on the house of a private citizen, but he happened to have in his possession the ancient crown and a number of relics of inestimable value. The crown, which was the chief prize of the collection, is of very beautiful workmanship, and very old. It is surmounted by a hand holding a sword. It has upon it three heads. Gold seals and other treasures were also taken by the thieves. It would be interesting to know the history of that crown. It doubtless was in past times the symbol of authority, and was of more importance than its intrinsic value. Now, however, it carries no significance, and is merely a collector's relic. Not so is the crown which is promised to the faithful servant of our Lord. It can never lose its import throughout eternity. Happy they for whom it is reserved, and who heed the warning of the Giver:

Hold that fast that thou hast, that no man take thy crown (Rev. 3: 11).

Selling His Child

The exposure of an unnatural bargain is exciting the community in an English town. It was discovered during the hearing of a case at Bradford recently, that a man had sold his seven-year-old son for the paltry sum of twelve cents. The heartless father and his wife, who was the boy's stepmother, were in the dock, charged with cruelty to the boy. The sale took place four years ago, and the transaction was made the subject of a written agreement. The purchaser, however, fell ill, and, being compelled to enter the infirmary, the boy returned to his father. The father gave him no welcome, but, locking him up in the house, went away on a pleasure trip. The boy was left alone in the house. The only food left for him was three pieces of bread and a little water. His bed consisted of a soap-box and a blanket. His distress attracted the attention of neighbors on the following day, and the unnatural father was followed and he and his wife arrested. What an estimate for a father to make of the value of his child as to sell him for such a trifle! It is not strange that when the boy returned, he was neglected. How many parents there are who would scorn to commit such brutality, yet who, like this man, forget the responsibility of their relation.

Children are a heritage of the Lord (Ps. 127: 3).

A Naive Proposal

A number of letters have recently been received by American citizens from Barcelona, Spain, containing a curious offer. The Spaniard who wrote them says that there is in Mexico a farm that once belonged to his uncle, a noted bishop. He has learned that a treasure worth several million dollars is buried on this farm. He proposes that a company be organized to search for the treasure. The company is to furnish the cost of the search, which is estimated at a hundred thousand dollars. So certain is the writer of success, that he states the arrangements he will make for the division of the treasure. He will claim one-half as his own share. The other half, after a substantial sum has been deducted to pay for the adoration of a specified saint, is to belong to the shareholders who supply the cost of the undertaking. There is little probability of a company being organized in this country for any such project. Not that people are not eager to share in any treasure that may be found, but because they will have doubt about its existence. It is much to be wished that their wisdom were carried further. Too many are eager to gain this world's wealth, which will pass away, while neglecting the offer of eternal riches, which are certain and abide forever.

The blessing of the Lord maketh rich and he addeth no sorrow with it (Prov. 10: 22).

Perilous Amusement

Two ambulance calls came to a hospital in New York on the same afternoon recently, for similar accidents. The first call was to a four-story apartment house, where a child was lying seriously injured. He was not more than six years old, and had been delighted with the gift of a kite. Anxious to try his new possession under favorable surroundings, he had gone to the roof of the house. After several efforts, the boy succeeded in getting the kite to rise. Once clear of the surrounding buildings, it soared upward until it had exhausted the string. It continued pulling, and afraid of losing his toy, the little fellow clung to it until he was drawn nearer and nearer to the edge, and fell over. He had so injured his skull that he died before he could be removed to the hospital. The other case was that of an older boy, who had taken the same means of flying his kite, and had been similarly drawn over. Happily, in his case, the house was not so high, and he had fallen on a heap of soft sand. Except for the shock, he was not seriously hurt. Doubtless he has heard of the fate of the other boy, and is thankful for his own escape. But the need of caution is not yet past. When he grows up he will learn of treasures which, if clung to, may involve a worse fate than death.

If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee: for it is better that one of thy members should perish and not thy whole body should be cast into hell (Matt. 5: 30).

An Ancient Map

An attempt to reconstruct the map of the United States and Canada in pre-Adamite times, is being made by Professor Schuebert of Yale, who has just returned from Canada, bringing a collection of fossils, which he collected during his trip. He is now engaged in arranging them, with the object of making a map of the region as it existed in the early geologic era. Dr. Schuebert says: "As the rocks of the systems are the deposits of seas long extinct, it follows that the shells and corals representing the animals then living, and subsequently buried in the muds of that time, would be preserved in the rocks as fossils. The species found at Cumberland, Md., or at Oriskany Falls, N. Y., are again found in the same association at Grand Greve, in the Province of Quebec. These localities are more than 1,600 miles apart in a straight line, yet the shells of the two regions are so much alike that, even a beginner in geology, will note their identity." The general result of these studies is confirmation of the facts recorded in the Pentateuch, but formerly disputed by geologists.

Truth shall spring out of the earth (Ps. 85: 11).

BRIEF NOTES

The National Purity Conference will be held at La Crosse, Wis., October 17 to 19.

At a recent meeting held in Japan in the interest of Young Men's Christian Associations, one hundred students professed conversion.

At the American Board's meeting at Seattle, the protest against the acceptance of Mr. Rockefeller's gift of $100,000 was met by the reply which means that the money will be kept.

HOW SMALL THINGS ARE GREATENED

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F Crafts*

"I looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold"

AS when a plan has materialized or a deed has been accomplished, one often contemplates the circumstances which led up to it, so we will consider in this lesson the visions and words of Zechariah the prophet, as potent influences in the rebuilding of the Temple, the completion of which was the subject of the lesson of last week. The Lord raised up Zechariah for such a time as that. And, too, the Lord gave him visions which answered the discouragements and doubts of the people. These Zechariah afterwards interpreted to them for their strengthening.

Let us now contemplate the "fifth vision." The basis of it was the golden candlestick of the Tabernacle, for which God gave the pattern to Moses on the Mount (Ex. 25:31-40). It was of beaten work of solid gold, to the value of thirty thousand dollars. In size, it was five feet in height, and three and one-half feet across the top. It was, in reality, not a candlestick, but a lamp-stand; candles were not burned upon it, but lamps, which were filled with olive oil.

The form and appearance of the golden candlestick is preserved in the sculptures on the arch of Titus in Rome, which was reared to commemorate the taking of Jerusalem by Roman power, and the bringing of the sacred vessels of the Temple to Rome. But while Zechariah's vision was like the golden candlestick of Moses, it was different in several vital points. Moses' candlestick had seven lamps, which required to be filled every day by the hand of a priest or a servant. Zechariah's golden candlestick had a bowl on the top, into which flowed, through two pipes, a constant supply of oil from two olive trees, one growing on either side. The oil flowed from the bowl into the several branches of the candlestick, and fed the lamps, keeping them burning.

When the vision was given of the Lord to Zechariah, he did not understand it, and prayed that he might be told the meaning. An angel was sent to explain that the candlestick meant the Jewish people, through whom God wanted to give the light of his blessing to the whole world, and that they must be a good and obedient people to be so used by him. But God would have Zechariah teach them that they could do nothing of themselves, as a lamp cannot burn and shine without oil. So they must have the Spirit of God in their hearts to be able to live righteously. God would also have Zechariah teach them that they might have the help of God's Spirit without ceasing, just as the growing olive trees yielded a continuous supply of oil to the shining lamps.

When Zechariah conveyed this vision to the discouraged temple builders, who were being set on by the alien people to hinder their work, great hope sprung up in their hearts, for they saw what a large place God had prepared for them among the nations of the world. And they were fortified by the promise of his constant presence and help. A definite promise was also given to them that the Temple should be finished by their hands, under their leader, Zerubbabel.

Illustration and Application

1. How Small are Greatened by the Spirit of a Man. The next greatest thing to the Spirit of God is the spirit in man. That even the human spirit at its best, when manifested in burning patriotism and kindred enthusiasm, makes the small great and the weak mighty, has been illustrated anew in the triumph of the Japanese, whose unparalleled courage and patriotism has made them giants in achievement. It recalls the instance when an energetic boy was asked his weight, and replied, "Generally I weigh eighty pounds, but when I'm mad I weigh a ton." The truth he was seeking to express was that earnestness adds greatly to our weight and force in the battle of life. Of like import was the husband's appreciation of his enthusiastic and efficient wife, "She's little, but oh my!" Many a college valedictorian has been outstripped in the race of life by classmates less talented, but with more "spirit."

The new metal, radium, is least of all metals in quantity, but it is said an ounce of it would crack a mountain. It is not bulk but power that tells in an explosive. Some of the smallest men physically have been known as "little giants" because of their great influence. It is important for a boy to develop a strong body to be the effective servant of the soul, but the greatest thing in education, whether in public school or college or Sunday School, is to wake up the spirit in a boy or girl.

2. How Small Things Are Greatened by the Spirit of God. How different are the dead idols that heathen worship from the Holy Spirit, fitly represented by the burning flame, the living water! A young Chinaman, an idol worshiper, who had become a captain in the army, was one day engaged in target practice near some idols. A stray bullet of one of his companions struck one of the idols. He expected to see the careless offender struck down by the god's wrath, but nothing happened to him. The consequence was that something happened to the captain himself. He was led to see that an idol is nothing but a piece of wood or stone or metal, and to turn to the Christian worship of the living God. There is another good story of a little boy in India called Tookahanum, who was journeying to a missionary boarding school when as yet he believed in idols. As he went, he saw at a river he must cross a lot of people in great excitement trying to pull a heavy stone god out of the river, into which it had fallen in the night because the water had undermined the temple. When men and ropes were found to be insufficient they sent for chains and oxen. Tookahanum watched them for some time, but at length proceeded on his journey, easily swimming the river. "It is very strange," said the boy, "that the god cannot get himself out of the river, when I can swim it so easily." That reasoning helped Tookahanum, when he got to the Christian school, to give up his idols and serve the living God.

We think idol worship very foolish, but it is just as bad to worship a living God with a service as dead and cold as a stone. Near Syracuse, N. Y., a geologic expedition headed by Prof. W. B. Clark, has discovered a cave of perpetual ice, through which runs a stream of ice water all the year. It is supposed to be the remains of a glacier of the glacial period. There are some professing Christians whose hearts are ice caves, and even some churches are scarcely more—the formal service flowing along its way, beautiful but cold. In London there are among the Jews professional worshipers hired to go from synagogue to synagogue, because a service cannot be held with less than ten males over thirteen years of age. In fashionable neighborhoods, that number of men cannot be relied upon to attend the service, and so poor men are hired at a small salary to be on hand to make sure the service is something more than a woman's meeting. There are some places of worship other than synagogues, where the attendance of men also tends to the vanishing point, and where the attendance of the men and even of the women who come, tends to be a mere professional formality.

Two friends met on the street one Monday morning. "Were you at church yesterday?" said one. "No," said the other; "the fact is, I am trying to do more business than I have been doing, and I find I have to go down to the office on Sunday. It isn't just the thing, perhaps, but I simply have to do it." I don't see how you can reconcile you to going to business on Sunday, thoug said the first; "that's a thing I will n do." "Were you at church yesterda asked the other. "No; I confess I wasn answered the first; "that is, I work so h every day of the week that I am d tired on Sundays, and I don't feel like ting up, so that I have a good, long s instead. I am trying to enlarge my b ness, and I was at the office until ten, Saturday night.

Is it a duty of a Christian to keep faculties fresh for Sunday worship, eve it involves doing a little less on Saturd and is there very much difference betw the Sunday worker and the Sunday sleep Next of rank in guilt to the man sleeps at home in church time, is the whose soul is only half awake at chu or in the performance of other Christ duties.

Our souls, how heavily they go,
To reach eternal joys!

Those earthen lamps on the lamp-st of Zechariah's vision represent individ Christians in their natural weakness. into these earthen vessels flows the "tre ure" of the Spirit from the Father the Son, pictured by the two olive tree fruitfulness and peace; and as a con quence each of these creatures of d shines with beneficent influence, influe which multiplies by their union in lamp-stand of the church.

The coming of the Holy Spirit me pardon, first of all. Let us not shut this oil of gladness by rejecting the H Spirit. Finney tells a weird and striki story of a politician for whose salvati he prayed earnestly for some time. Af a little while it became evident that Spirit of God was dealing with the m His conviction of sin increased until it came deep and distressing. Finney urg him to give his heart to God, and end t conflict, but he hesitated. At last he sa "No, Mr. Finney, I shall have nothi more to do with this matter until I retu from the Legislature. I stand committ to my political friends to carry out certa measures in the Legislature that are compatible with my first becoming Christian; and I will not attend to t subject until after I have returned from Albany When he returned from the Legislature the Spirit h evidently ceased to strive with him. He would ha nothing to do with religion, and soon after died in sins. Let our case be rather like that of the sailor w received a card as he was leaving a mission service, which was written, "If I should die to-night I should to ———." At the bottom was, "Please fill up t card and sign it." The sailor threw it among son papers in his box, but when he was lying in his bunk, il he noticed the discarded card, and this caused him think seriously. When he returned from his voyage, h handed in his card at the mission, signed, with "heaven written in the blank space. Not alone that we may g to heaven, but that we may help to make a "bett country" and a "better world," here and now let receive the Spirit that knocks at our heart's door.

He brings not only pardon but peace, as expressed i the Quaker's prayer:

Dear Lord and Father of mankind,
Forgive our feverish ways,
Reclothe us in our rightful mind,
In purer life thy service find,
In deeper reverence praise.
Drop thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our striving cease,
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of thy peace.

And with pardon and peace the Holy Spirit gives puri fication. Water is the frequent symbol of the Holy Spirit' work, and so we may well recall how the Rhone, that en ters into Lake Leman a muddy torrent, flows out a rive of crystal emerald, like the glistening stones of heaven

But the Holy Spirit's greatest gift is power, by whic our weakness becomes completeness in another's greate strength. The modern steel traveling crane is in every great manufactory to-day. A car loaded with a ladle o molten iron is run in the entrance. Up there on its tracks, twenty feet above, is the crane, with a heavy steel chain hanging from it. The workman below hooks the chain to the handle of the ladle containing the molten iron. The dead tons below are chained to that dead steel above. But then the man up yonder moves a switch connecting with storage batteries, and the power behind winds up that chain, lifts the ladle like a feather, and sets it down at will. Dead steel and connection meant power.

A far greater instance of power was that of a converted butcher in England, who brought to Christ by the power of an endless life in himself, his wife, his brother and wife, another brother and his bethrothed, and then his mother and sister.

OUR FAMILY CIRCLE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Season and the Brides

WHATEVER else autumn brings or omits it never fails to bring with it the glad chime of wedding bells.

October has been a favorite month for marriage, partly because it stands midway between summer and winter, and partly because its crisp weather and radiant sunshine invite to outdoor exercise and pleasurable jaunting to and fro.

The October bride has an advantage over a June bride in the preparation of her trousseau. She may include in it more durable gowns and richer fabrics than are appropriate for midsummer. What she really needs in the way of clothing may easily be reduced to a small compass, but most brides like a store of wedding garments and finery, very much as if they were to spend the rest of their lives in absence from stores and dressmakers.

Every bride, if she can, should have a generous outfit of linen, this being the wife's special contribution to the new home. Under this heading are grouped sheets, pillow-slips, towels, doilies, table-cloths, napkins, centrepieces, quilts, and whatever else falls into the line of furniture for bed and board.

The linen may be marked with the bride's monogram or her maiden initials. Some brides have it marked with their married name, but this is in doubtful taste. A linen-shower is a very delightful gift to present to a bride, and one in which a number of her friends may easily combine if they choose.

A carved chest to hold linen is an acceptable wedding present.

Incidentally, let us note that our autumn brides must write a note of thanks to each friend who may send them a gift. The note, if possible, to be written before the wedding day, or as soon as practical afterward.

Silver presented to a bride bears her maiden initials. It is best to leave the engraving to her, as if she receive duplicates of some article, she may like to exchange it for some other desired thing.

MOTHERLESS

It is easy to read the story told in this picture. The child's mother is dead. The father, tenderly caring for the little one, is trying to earn the bread of both, by writing for the press. Life is hard and gains are few. God help them!

Last Words

At the first thought it would hardly seem that an interesting book of more than three hundred pages could be made of the last words of distinguished men and women. Yet, such a book, compiled by Frederic Rowland Marvin, is almost unique in its quality of interesting reading. The last words, for instance, of Frederick the Great of Russia were, "Throw a quilt over it." A favorite dog was watching by the dying bed, and the dying king saw a shiver. His last thought was one of kindness for his pet. The last words of Lord Byron were, "I must sleep now."

Very beautiful were those of Felicia Hemens, the poet, "I feel as if I were sitting with Mary at the feet of my Redeemer, hearing the music of his voice and learning of him to be meek and lowly." The last words of the sainted Alfred Cookman were these, "I am sweeping through the gates, washed in the blood of the Lamb." Schiller, the great German poet, turned to his wife, saying, "Dear, good one." Just before this, he said, "Many things are growing plain and clear to my understanding."

The chevalier Bunsen, looking at his wife, said, "In thy face have I seen the Christ." Richard Baxter, author of the Saint's Rest, said, "I have pain, but I have peace." Sir Walter Scott, addressing Lockhart, his friend and son-in-law, said, "My dear, be a good man. Be virtuous. Be religious. Be a good man. Nothing else can give you any comfort when you come to lie here." The poet Keats said, "I feel the flowers growing over me." The martyr, Hugh Latimer, about to be burned at the stake, said to his fellow, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England, as I trust shall never be put out."

A Wonderful Reunion

After forty years' separation, there was a reunion the other day of a family of five sisters, who met at the home of one of them, Mrs. Elizabeth Upton, in Ansonia, Conn. Mrs. Lydia Trueman came from Dyer, Neb., Mrs. Isabel Jukes from Chicago, Mrs. Mary A. Redfern from Providence, and Mrs. Eleanor Butterfield from Lynn. No doubt, some of these sisters had met from time to time; but forty years, a span of time that takes people from bright youth to the beginning of old age, had passed by since they all sat around one table. One may imagine the pleasure of such an occasion, the laughter and the tears, the reminiscences, the backward looks into the past, the joy of feeling again the kindred thrill. Five elderly women, who were once five merry-hearted girls, must have had a good deal to say to one another, and if there were daughters looking on, they probably had to take back seats for the moment.

THE AMBULANCE

I never see in our bustling town,
Where the midsummer sun pours fiercely down,
The swift onrush of the ambulance,
But I think of the blessed countenance
Of One who walked by lane and field,
And with voice and look the suffering healed.
Still, where the city's woes are thick,
The dear Christ-spirit heals the sick.
And yet He lives in the hearts of men,
And sends his angels with speed again.
Wherever the weary plod and fall,
His care and tenderness over all.
And the angels carry lint and lance,
And drive in the city's ambulance;
Are bluff of speech and deft of hand,
And quick with accents of command;
And the wind of their coming clears the way
For a breath of heaven in the darkest day.

City or Country Homes?

WHETHER to live in the city or the country is a mooted question with families of small means, when the children are many and the mother very tired. Town life offers advantages in the way of schools, of church life, and of friendly companionship for parents and children. It also may give a man a home closer to his business, thus saving him the expense and fatigue of commuting. The question here is not one that presents itself to those who are farmers and derive their subsistence from the soil. They are in their natural environment, have plenty to do and know how to do it, and their families easily accommodate themselves to the occupation and the pleasures of the farm. Take, however, the case of a clerk or salesman, or a traveling man who is necessarily often absent from home. He and his wife choose a country home, not exactly in a suburb, which is usually dear, but in a rural locality where land is cheap and they can get a comfortable place for very little money. Such places are still to be had, though one may have to look for them. In the country, the children will grow up with plenty of fresh air, with the many little chores that are to do around a place, perhaps with a pony, a cow, chickens and the various interests that farm life has for children. There will be, too, the little district school, presided over by a teacher who is not to be unfairly compared with those who officiate in graded schools. But what about the mother? It may be taken for granted that she will have all the housework, including the laundry work, the cooking and everything that is to be done, on her own hands. Domestic help is not to be had for love or money in such a home. The mother has the sewing, mending, nursing, care-taking, and everything else that is in the province of home-making, to do all by herself, and, unless she is very strong, she will break down. She will probably have few near neighbors, and will miss the dropping in of friends and the informal visiting which greatly relieve the monotony of life in town.

The problem resolves itself into the consideration of the relative values in the case. Shall the mother's health, strength and spirits take precedence in the settlement, or shall the children be first thought of and the decision made wholly for their good? Such a question as this does not intrude itself upon well-to-do people who have both city and country homes, or upon those whose lives are full of ease and who have abundant opportunities for change and rest. It is not the problem of the very poor, but it does confront that immensely important and thoughtful contingent who make up the bulk of our working force in this great Republic. It would seem that the mother should have the casting vote. Her happiness, her vigor and her freedom from nervous irritability are vital issues in the life of her family. If she pines and longs for friends and neighbors and finds country solitude more than she can endure, at almost any cost a removal should be effected to some small village where she may have friends about her. A woman is much more dependent upon friendly acquaintance and neighbors than is her husband. If no change can be secured, the mother must be philosophical. She will probably then be sufficiently unselfish to rejoice in the welfare of her children.

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

J. E. T., Somerville, Mass. What is ambergris, and where is it found? Where can some be seen?

Ambergris, is a morbid secretion of the liver of the spermaceti whale, and is often found floating in the water. It is bright gray in color, streaked with black and yellow, and so soft that it may be flattened between the fingers. It exhales an agreeable odor when heated. A piece, the largest ever found, weighing 130 pounds, sold for $2,500. Ask the Director of the Museum of Natural History, Boyleston Street, Boston.

E. J. M., Waugh River, Nova Scotia. 1. Who was Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, and did she have any children? 2. Where did her husband die, and is there a monument to him in San Francisco? Was he wealthy?

R. Louis Stevenson was married to a Mrs. Osborne in 1880; Mrs. Stevenson has two children, we believe, by her first husband. 2. He died on one of the Samoan islands in 1894. We never heard of the monument you refer to, nor that he left any fortune. Mrs. Stevenson's present address is unknown to us.

Jere. F., Trenton, N. J. I am a young reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I like it very much for the interesting news it gives of Christian work in all lands, and for the fact that its proprietor, Dr. Klopsch, so grandly leads the way in world-wide Christian benevolences. Will you kindly state with what great charities he has been identified? This would interest many who, like myself, have been reading the paper for only a few years.

Dr. Klopsch has personally conducted relief work in Russia, Cuba, India, Finland, and other countries, making long and hazardous journeys of many thousands of miles for that purpose. He has also organized and carried out relief work in China, Armenia, Turkey, Porto Rico, and our own Western and Southern States. He has established orphanages and training schools in India, Africa, and parts of Central and Southern China—a work that is still going forward successfully. He is the founder of the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, and for several years has guaranteed the support of the Bowery Mission. In all these enterprises he regards himself as simply the instrument in God's hands of doing good, with the generous co-operation of others.

C. S. N., Jacksonville, Fla. Who wrote the lines, "O Thou Eternal One, whose presence bright all space doth occupy"?

They are from the pen of Gabriel Romanovitch Derzhaven.

M. C., Macedon, N. Y. Why is it that Greenland appears larger than the United States on maps, when the latter has about seventy seven times as many square miles as the former?

The apparent disproportionate size of Greenland, shows that the map was made on a scale larger than the map of the United States that you saw. It may be that the map was one for the use of seamen, and constructed on the system of Mercator, in which the contraction toward the poles is not given, in order to show at a glance the relative position of various countries. In consequence, Greenland would appear much larger than it is in reality.

Inquirer, Oakham, Mass. Who does the picture "Baby Stuart," represent?

The Duke of York, youngest son of Charles I, and brother of Charles II. He later became King James II of England and VIII of Scotland.

J. L., New York. Why should not Russia, since another meeting of the Hague Conference is so greatly desired by the Czar, take up for review the case of Finland? Surely it would be better than to discuss the dead-and-gone battles and issue of the Russo-Japanese war.

We should hardly expect that Russia would take the initiative in bringing up the case of Finland at the Hague. If, however, some other Power — England or France—were to make such a proposition, it might result in this whole matter being brought up in review before the world's greatest tribunal. Why isn't this a wiser and more hopeful line of agitation than that of armed revolution, which, in the case of Finland, can only produce fresh oppression, sorrow and disaster?

C. S. S., Rubberdale, Pa. What is the temperature of the Atlantic Ocean midway between New York and Liverpool, in the month of June?

The temperature is about 35° Fahrenheit on the ocean floor. The surface temperature follows the atmospheric temperature, but very much less in amount. Below 1,800 to 2,400 feet, the change in temperature is slight.

Thomas, New York City. Will you kindly inform me who is the rightful owner of the Jumel property?

The Jumel estate was mostly sold at auction, lot by lot, years ago. The mansion, built in 1766 by Col. Morris, a British officer, with the immediate inclosure, is owned by a patriotic society, or is in charge of it. There was a controversy a year or two ago between two such organizations. The point was, which association should have the house. Accurate information can probably be obtained by a letter addressed to "Custodian of Jumel Mansion," One Hundred and Sixtieth Street and St. Nicholas Avenue.

M. M., Oaks Corners, N. Y. Will you kindly tell me the meaning of this verse: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him: but I will maintain my own ways before Him" (Job 13: 15)? I do not understand the last clause.

The charge of Job's friends was that he must have been exceptionally sinful, otherwise he would not have been so severely afflicted. Job, conscious that he had not sinned so heinously, declared himself ready to defend his ways.

F. B. A., Sharon, Mass. Which to your mind is most to be condemned, a $60,000 thief or a drunkard?

God regards the heart—the motive, while man simply deals with the act itself. There are doubtless many acts,

The "Riven Tomb" in Hanover

In the city of Hanover is a graveyard which has been closed for a number of years—the Garden Churchyard. Owing to its antiquated monuments, and the fact of its being the resting-place of a number of celebrated characters, it still awakens much curiosity. Charlotte Kestner (Werther's "Lotte") is buried here. A few paces east of the unassuming little church in the graveyard, is a monument tottering from its foundations. It is built in the form of steps, and the massive stones are secured by heavy iron clasps. The monument was erected in 1782. Beside the usual family inscriptions, at the base of the monument are engraved these lines:

"This sepulchre, purchased for all eternity, is not permitted to be opened."

Opposed to this determination, a beech seed, perhaps carried by the wind, found its way into a crevice of the foundation. The tiny shoot grew into a sapling; it forced its way upward, through the cement. In the course of years it became a great tree, with roots that grasped in their mighty embrace the base of the sarcophagus. It rent the strong iron clasps asunder and pushed away the stones, exposing the very heart of the tomb. It was as though an irresistible power, divinely guided, had been specially chosen to set at naught the power of man, which had apparently sealed this grave forever. This tomb, which is widely known as "The Springing Grave," is a sight that attracts many visitors.

legal from a human standpoint, yet absolutely sinful in God's sight. To defraud a brother; to defame by stealth and innuendo; to misrepresent in business; to conduct your affairs so that others may be crushed and ruined while you flourish—these may all be within the law, but God condemns them, even though the world applauds, as it too often does, the successful sinner.

E. L. C., Alameda, Calif. We have simply stated the facts concerning Archbishop Ussher's chronologies. They do not in any way interfere with the validity of Scripture. In the Bible genealogies, however, a man is frequently called the son of a remote ancestor, as, for example, "Shebuel, the son of Gershon, the son of Moses" (I Chron. 26:24). See also similar cases in I Kings 19: 16; II Kings 9:20; II Chron. 22:7; Gen. 29:5, et Thus, in accordance with this rule, a man might ha been, and probably was, called the son of some gre ancestor who had lived many generations before.

J. T. R. Baltimore, Md. What does Paul mean by describi Christ (Heb. 7:17) as a high priest after the order of Melc zedek?

The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, wheth Paul or some other person, was showing the superiori of Christianity to Judaism. It too had its priest and sa rifice. The Jew might answer that Christ could not be high priest as he did not come of the tribe of Levi, t which the priesthood was confined. The answer is that the was another order of priesthood—that of Melchizedek which Abraham recognized (Gen. 14: 20) by paying hi tithes. Christ belonged to that order as the Psalmi had predicted (Ps. 110: 4), and Levi, through his ancesto had thus indicated his superiority. It is an argumer that would have weight with a Jew. It is a curiou fact, that among the recently discovered Tel el-Amarn tablets, are letters from one Ebed-tob, King of Uru Salir (Jerusalem), who describes himself as not having receive the crown by inheritance from father or mother, bu from the mighty God. We know nothing of Melchizedek beyond the scanty references in Genesis, but this table appears to intimate that the ancient Kings of Jerusalem claimed this divine right.

Reader, Hamden Junction, O. If a Christian falls into sin and sincerely repents, may he hope for forgiveness, in spite of th fact that he had been converted before he fell?

Backsliders are encouraged to return, and are promised forgiveness if they forsake their sin (see Deut. 4: 29 II. Chron. 30: 9; Jer. 3: 12; Hos. 14: 4; John 6: 37 I. John 1: 7, and many other passages). Ezekiel goes so far as to say that the repentant man shall not even be reminded of his sin (Ezek. 18: 22). It is the disposition that counts. Sometimes restitution is impossible, but God does not require of any man more than he is able to perform. You may be quite sure that no truly penitent man is ever rejected, if he goes humbly to God and pleads for forgiveness in Christ's name. Only he must renounce and put away his sin.

Reader, Davenport, Ia. I have read several of the works of Thomas Carlyle, but a friend warns me against reading more, on the ground that he was an infidel. Is that true?

It is not true. His most intimate friend, Froude, expressly says that Carlyle saved him from infidelity. He had an abhorrence of cant, hypocrisy and intolerance, and some of his remarks on those subjects were construed as attacks on religion. He had an objection to dogmatizing about mysterious subjects and a contempt for men who set up their own opinions as being absolute truth. To the last, however, he insisted that there was no vital difference between his attitude on religion and that of his saintly mother, who was a rigid Presbyterian.

E. S. B., Philadelphia, Pa. Are the parables of our Lord historically true? Was there such a man, for example, as the Good Samaritan?

Christ used these parables to point or illustrate the truths he wished to teach. There are no means now of ascertaining whether they were actual facts. It is most probable, however, that there were such cases as that of the Good Samaritan. Doubtless many such incidents as that of the wise and unwise virgins occurred in Palestine. It would not detract from their value, however, if they were mere illustrations. It is the truth that they were used to illustrate, that is the thing we have to consider. Truth is often expressed pointedly in picture form, as in the case of Æsop's fables, which, though not true, teach a truth. To this day the dog in the manger is the most expressive way of reproving a selfish man.

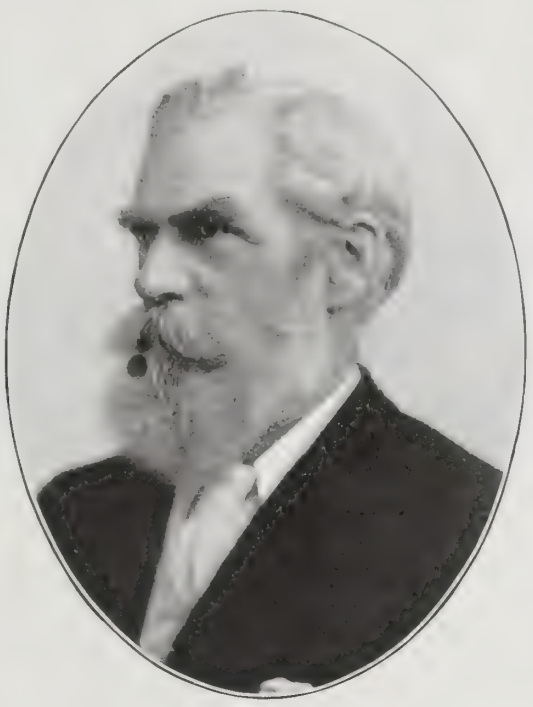
Industrial Missions in India

THERE are probably few men who are better known in connection with the subject of industrial missions than Henry William Fry, who is now on a visit to the United States. Mr. Fry is a grandson of the celebrated Quaker philanthropist, Elizabeth Fry. He a nephew of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart, who took a prominent part in the emancipation of the slaves in the British colonies.

Mr. Fry has traveled very extensively over many parts of Asia, Europe, Africa, and North and South America, as well as Canada and Australasia. He has been twice around the world, twelve times in India. He is the author of several books on Scriptural and religious subjects. Commercial interests as well as a taste for foreign travel have made him a veritable globe trotter.



Henry William Fry

"During many years of Oriental travel," he explained to the writer, "I was always interested in missionary subjects, but since 1895, I have made a special study of the industrial missionary problem. As a result, I founded, seven or eight years ago, in London, the Industrial Mission's Aid Society, which organized a rug factory at Ahmednagar, with a depot in London for the sale of missionary products. It has also a flourishing industrial work in Mombasa, on the East coast of Africa, and supports a large number of persons connected with thirty or forty mission stations, selling their industrial products in the London depot. I also founded the Foreign Missions Industrial Association, in New York, which has, I trust, a useful career of the same sort before it.

"In India," Mr. Fry continued, "I visited many Mission stations where industrial work was carried on. Amongst the principal of these were the Basle (German) Mission in Calicut, where they employ hundreds of workers in making roofing tiles, in weaving, in carpentry, etc.; the Marathi Mission of the American Board at Ahmednagar, where I started a rug factory to co-operate with the missionaries; and the work, mainly agricultural, now carried on by the same mission at Sirur. I also visited the two industrial missions at Bombay (under the American Board), one superintended by Miss Abbott and the other by Mrs. Edward Hume. Also, the work at Akola, carried on by the Alliance Mission; that at Hoshangabad, belonging to the Mission of the English Society of Friends; at Madras, under the American Methodists; at Calcutta, under the London Mission; at Karur, under the English Wesleyans; at Aurungabad, and also at Agra, Madras, and Nasik, under the English Church Missionary Society; at Karjat, under the Scotch Church, besides many others.

"Having inspected these efforts, my impression was that there was a very great scope of usefulness for such work in co-operation with missions, provided the amateur element could be superseded by expert direction; and if industrial training could be supplemented by permanent industrial employment for those technically trained.

"Missionaries, as a rule, are not technical, however," he continued. "In most cases, their efforts along industrial lines are purely amateur. One must admire the self-denial missionaries display in doing what they can to promote such an effort on their stations; but there can be no question that had they the means to do so, it would be vastly preferable for all concerned, if they could put everything of an industrial nature under separate expert superintendence."

"Can the missionary combine industrial with spiritual work successfully, or does experience show the contrary?" the writer interrogated.

"I do not like to see a spiritual missionary involving himself with industrial work, if it can in any way be avoided," Mr. Fry replied; "but I do like to see technical men undertaking industrial effort in co-operation with mission stations, and combine, as they very usefully can, spiritual work with their industrialism. The missionary should confine himself, if he has to take up industrial work, to elementary training; but wherever possible, it should not be conducted by the missionary, but by an industrial expert specially set aside for the purpose. They must, however, seek a market for their products, assuming they make anything salable."

"What proportion of the children now being trained individually at any one mission, may be expected to became self-supporting through the trade they are learning?" was the next question.

"According to the experience of the government in India, this proportion is unfortunately small. The average native, technically trained on a mission station, has been trained amongst Christians, and calls himself a Christian. If so, there is little opening for him in any heathen village. The remedy appears to be to provide him with an opening in some industry established for the purpose, where he can utilize his craft, and become a self-supporting member of the mission community."

"What is your solution of the industrial problem, as it is related to missions?"

"The industrial problem, whether connected with missions or speaking in general, will always exist, and is capable of only a partial solution. The best way to meet the difficulty in connection with missions, I believe to be in the establishment in co-operation with missions, but financially quite distinct, of industries in the form of factories or household industries, or, in certain places, of agricultural farms, to supplement the technical training given in mission schools. These industries must, wherever possible, be made self-supporting and be conducted on the very best commercial principles, and this for many reasons, amongst which are the following:

1. There is a distinct limit to the number of men who can be sent to the missionary field, and supported by home churches or individuals; but there is no limit to the number of sanctified industrialists who could be self-supporting, and devote themselves in their spare hours to help the missionaries, as lay members of their congregations assist ministers at home.

2. There is also a distinct limit to the money which the home churches are willing to subscribe for the support of missionary effort of any kind. If these industries can be made self-supporting, they will not divert subscriptions from spiritual to industrial work. At present, the boards, as a rule, do not officially recognize industrial work. They allow their missionaries to appeal to their friends for subscriptions for this purpose, and large sums are annually given in response to these appeals. Much of this, if it had not been donated for industrial work, would have been given to the ordinary work of the boards, who thus suffer pecuniarily. This is no reason, however, for preventing

A Gospel Ship of Mercy

THE Columbia Coast Mission began a work last spring among the loggers of the British Columbia timber camps, which has produced excellent results during the past months. It has been the means of giving these Pacific coast toilers the same care and protection as Dr. Grenfell's Mission has given to the fishermen of the Labrador coast.

Early in April last, a stout little ship was launched at Vancouver, fitted out as a floating hospital, and sent north along the coast of Vancouver Island, where, within a distance of one hundred miles, some three thousand men are at work in the logging camps. These men, exposed to frequent danger, were absolutely without medical care, and the nearest hospital accommodation was at Vancouver. A coast steamer rarely arrived at that port without one or more disabled loggers, who had perhaps been suffering for weeks before they could be sent to the hospital. Some remedy for this had been discussed for years past, but it was left to a home missionary to give it practical shape in the Columbia, a hospital ship that goes where and when it is needed. When the loggers first heard of it, they named it the Angel.

This ship of mercy is sixty feet long, has both engine and sails, and is fitted with a hospital ward, capable of treating two cases at a time. Her crew includes the missionary and a surgeon; the former is a trained sailor and acts as captain, while the doctor is a qualified engineer and runs the ship. These two men, the Rev. John Antle and Dr. W. A. B. Hutton, have already proved themselves the woodsmen's friends. A companion part of the mission's scheme is a hospital at Rock Bay, half-way down the coast, to which the ship acts as an ambulance, running continually between it and the logging camps.

There is a spiritual side to the work as well. The Columbia is not only a floating hospital but a circulating library, and carries a supply of magazines and papers for distribution along the coast. Mr. Antle also holds Gospel meetings at the camps or settlements whenever possible. The practical working of this mission has already been marked with blessing. To the lonely places has gone the comfort of healing; empty and idle hours have been brightened with clean reading; and the Gospel has found a welcome in the woods. The work will be continued as late as navigation remains open, and it is hoped some provision will be made to reach the camps during the winter months.

individual missionaries from making these appeals, because a good deal of the money so collected would not be given except for industrial work, and, morever, the industrial work does indirectly greatly assist the spiritual side; but it is a reason for adopting every honorable commercial expedient to make such work independent of donations, and, if possible, profitable to the mission.

3. There is much capital in the hands of Christian people which they cannot afford to donate, which they could invest in industries co-operating with the missionaries, provided they can be assured that such industries are commercially sound.

4. The best commercial principles are the wisest principles which human wisdom has been able to devise for the successful carrying on of any industrial or commercial enterprise. Why should the work of the Lord be attempted on any lower principle?

5. Unless the enterprise is commercial in character, under separate commercial management, the sympathies of the missionary are liable to ruin the work. His desire to get his protegés lenient hours of work and generous wages, would kill any ordinary industry as soon as the capital is eaten up, as it soon would be. This can be prevented by wise commercial judgment, to the ultimate advantage of all concerned.

"Assuming that factories were built and operated, the workers being from the missions, how and where could you market the product?"

"It depends what the product is," replied Mr. Fry. "Some would be suited for local consumption, others for export. Speaking broadly, I would prefer to see the products consumed locally; but for the purpose of keeping people at home interested in foreign missionary enterprise, it would be well always to have a supply of suitable mission made goods on the home market. The missionary himself should, if it can by any means be avoided, have nothing whatever to do with the producing of these goods, or with their sale, but the whole should be quite distinct wherever the industry warrants a separate staff."

"Would not the establishment of factories tend to make the children little 'slaves of labor,' as they could not learn to make any complete article, but only a part?"

"Factories may not be ideal in the openings they provide," said Mr. Fry, "but they are vastly better than nothing. I think factories, conducted on humane and wise principles, may be a very valuable object lesson to Indian industrialists. There are many 'brown slaves of the mills' in India now, especially in Bombay, and there is an effort being made to teach the native proprietors that it is short-sighted policy from their own point of view, to overwork their employees. Mission industries might, and probably would, demonstrate this. The employees at the rug factory I founded at Ahmednagar are paid by piece-work, and they cause much more trouble by demanding more rather than less work."

"Is there any reasonable probability of missionary industrial training bringing about a reform, or any radical change, in the primitive methods now prevailing throughout India?"

"The tendency would undoubtedly be in that direction;" said the traveler, smiling; "but to make any real reform or radical change amongst a population of over 300,000,000 would probably need a very much larger work than missions are likely to accomplish for years to come. This, however, is no reason why a beginning should not be made. Rome was not built in a day."

Foreign Missions*

WHILE the mission work of the whole Church of our Lord is a matter of e deepest interest to every child of God, e work being done by the representa- ves of the denomination to which he be- ngs has a special claim on his thoughts id his prayers. By whomsoever the life- ving message is made known, we rejoice, it it is particularly gratifying if some an or woman whom we have had a share sending out and supporting, has been onored of God in the conversion of the eathen. They ought to know that they e not exiled from our sympathies, and at in their isolation, away from home id friends, they hold a place in our hearts id that our prayers are being offered for eir success. There is no denomination at has been without its missionary tri- nphs during the past year. From every rt of the globe, there have come testi- onies that the Gospel is exerting its old ower, and is winning trophies for the ross.

Probably in no quarter of the world, not cepting China and Japan, has the pro- ess of missions in the last half century en so marked as in Africa. That vast ntinent, which, on the maps of 1800, peared as a mere fringe around the asts, its teeming interior a huge blank, traveled and unexplored, has now been aversed by missionary workers, carrying e glad message of salvation to dark uls. With their work has gone civiliza- on, suppressing the slave trade and kin- ed evils, and developing the resources of e continent. With it, too, to our sorrow, s gone the cupidity of the white man, inging on the natives the curse of forced bor, and the vices and miseries of Euro- an lands. This has been the great obsta- e that the missionary has had to contend th, and it is a marvel that he has done so uch as he has. The native who has heard the cruelties practised on the Congo, may ll be forgiven if he rejects a religion, e representatives of which, as he regards em, are so ruthless and so cruel. It is the hite man and his ways that keep Ethiopia om stretching out its hands unto God.

In spite of the obstacles in his way, the nse ignorance of the people, the deadly mate, and the iniquities of the white an, the progress of the Gospel has been normous. Dr. Laws tells us that in 1875, hen he went to Africa, he went from ake Nyassa across the Continent to the est coast, passing through thousands of llages, meeting millions of people, but t a single missionary. To the North d East there were but few, far apart and th few helpers. Slowly and painfully, e languages spoken by these people had be learned and reduced to writing. he work was stupendous; but workers me, and with faith in God, and bound- ss enthusiasm, they set patiently to work. he American Board, the London Mis- onary Society, the Church Missionary ociety, the Baptist Missionary Union, e Methodist Episcopal Society, all had eir representatives in the field. Moffat d Livingstone had prepared the way, d had proved what could be done. As the ork developed, more workers went out, til now there are 2,400 white mission- ies in the field, with 13,000 native help- s. Nearly the whole of this vast force s been accumulated within the past half ntury.

This army of Christian workers, belong- g to many lands and many societies, ems large, but it is small compared with e area to be covered and the population be reached. There are thickly popu- ted districts in which the Gospel has not t been preached, but strategic points ve been occupied, and from these the wer and influence of Christianity are ing forth. The number of actual com- unicants in the whole of Africa is esti- ated at 221,256, but beyond these there e 527,790 who are adherents, not yet fficiently instructed to be baptized, but e attendants on the services and have re- ounced heathenism. Besides this, there the encouraging fact that in the schools tablished by the missionaries, nearly four ousand in number, there are 202,390 ildren growing up under Christian in- uence. These will form a strong and eful force, familiar with the languages and customs of the people and capable of aiding powerfully in the dissemination of Gospel truth. Thus a beginning has been made—it is little more. But it is the hard- est part, and there is ground for hope.

Rockefeller on Strong Drink

IN speaking before the Sunday School of the Euclid Avenue Baptist Church in Cleveland, a few days ago, Mr. John D. Rockefeller took occasion to say a few timely words on the evils of that sort of "good fellowship" which leads a man to indulge in intoxicating liquors. He said:

A man does not have to drink to be witty. Drunkards' jibberings are not wit, neither are they humor. They are the most terribly serious thing in the world. The man who mutters them is a veritable social wreck.

You will find that that man may be wittier, more brilliant, attractive, and of greater help to his fellow-man who has never tasted a drop of intoxicants. With the first drink he loses all. I remember reading an incident in a newspaper several years ago illustrating this.

A drunkard was giving his testimony at a temperance meeting one evening. Two years before he had been graduated from Harvard University, never knowing the taste of liquor. Although he had been subjected to all conditions there he had passed through unscathed. But shortly after, while visiting home, his minister and some of the ladies asked him to taste wine. He did not wish to offend, so broke the rule which had kept him straight.

Two years after, at the time of the temperance meeting, he was in the gutter. He had lost all his friends, his brain was in a muddle, and he was completely deserted. And the minister who was leading the meeting was the man in whose house the student had first known intoxicating liquor.

Now, I think I shall let this matter rest right here, gentlemen. That college fellow, while he was at school, had a host of friends, was sought after for every function. With his first taste for liquor, following the breaking of his pledge, he was lost—his friends, his prestige, his self-respect even—all lost.

The Northfield Bible School

The Northfield Bible Training School for young women, starts on its sixteenth year with a carefully selected entering class, and with several important changes in the administration of the Institution, the most conspicuous of which has been the incorporation of the Training School with Northfield Seminary — the girl's school started twenty-five years ago by D. L. Moody. Both schools still keep their separate corporate identity, but the students of either may take advantage of the courses of the other. Among the other changes, Miss Mable W. Learoyd of Danvers, Mass., formerly of the faculty of Mt. Hermon, has been appointed principal. Dr. A. T. Pierson has been engaged as lecturer. Miss Ruth Ray, of East Orange, N. J., is the new head of the music department, and Miss Annie M. White, of New York City, has been added to the Bible department. The non-resident lecturers are Miss Margaret Slattery of Fitchburg, Mass., Prof. H. W. Hastings, and Prof. James McConaughy of Mt. Hermon, Mass. No change was made this year in the Board of Directors.

Russia and Bulgaria

Rev. Tzvetko S. Bagranoff, of Bulgaria, a minister of the Gospel in Bulgaria, now in this country with his wife, Nevenka S. Bagranoff, a graduate of the American College for Girls at Constantinople, will accept engagements to speak in churches and at Y. M. C. A., C. E., E. L., and other meetings, Sunday Schools, etc. Their addresses will be found more usually interesting, and Mrs. Bagranoff will sing. Subjects of addresses: "The Wonderful Progress of Bulgaria;" "Russia—the Nation and the Church:" "Missionary Efforts in Bulgaria and Macedonia:" "The Strife Between the Greek and Protestant Churches," and "The Present Social Strife in Bulgaria." Letters may be addressed to Mr. Bagranoff, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A LADY LECTURER

Feeds Nerves and Brains Scientifically.

A lady lecturer writes from Philadelphia concerning the use of right food, and how she is enabled to withstand the strain and wear and tear of her arduous occupation. She says:

"Through improper food, imperfectly digested, my health was completely wrecked and I attribute my recovery entirely to the regular use of Grape-Nuts food. It has, I assure you, proved an inestimable boon to me.

"Almost immediately after beginning its use, I found a gratifying change in my condition. The terrible weakness that formerly prostrated me after a few hours work, was perceptibly lessened by a few days use of Grape-Nuts and is now only a memory—it never returns.

"Ten days after beginning it I experienced a wonderful increase in mental vigor and physical energy, and continued use has entirely freed me from the miserable insomnia and nervousness from which I used to suffer so much.

"I find Grape-Nuts very palatable and would not be without the crisp, delicious food for even a day on any consideration. Indeed, I always carry it with me on my lecture tours."

There's a reason.

The Gospel in Wall Street

Preaching to the Brokers and Clerks in Wall Street

FOR more than a month of business days this season, the Rev. William Wilkinson, an Episcopalian pastor of Minnesota, has been preaching under the auspices of the Evangelical Committee of Greater New York, to the brokers of Wall Street. From a quarter-past twelve to one o'clock, clad in a black cassock, Mr. Wilkinson stood on a four-legged stool, eighteen inches high, about four feet from the sidewalk, in the street, facing the Custom House. His congregation stood upon the long rows of steps and on the pavement. Men from all walks of social, commercial, educational and religious life; bankers, brokers, railway men, bookkeepers, clerks, workingmen of all grades, lawyers, and women not a few, were there, all intent upon one purpose, and all as reverent as if in a church.

Rev. Wm. Wilkinson

At the prayers, which are always earnest, short, and applicable to the time and place, all the men take off their hats. There is no singing or music. The preacher stands with a Bible, some days only with a Gospel in his hands, and he tells the congregation the subject upon which he will speak. He appeals, not to the ignorance, or fear, or superstition, of those who come to hear, but to their intelligence and common sense, their appreciation of what is fair and reasonable. He took for granted that all present believed in God, and in their own responsibility to Him, and from this assumption, he showed the great verities of the faith of the overwhelming majority of God-fearing men spring into reality, beauty, harmony, and usefulness. He tells how the wonderful love of Christ is to all men, of all colors, creeds, and nations, the mighty power to reach down to and uplift all. He denounced sin in plain and unequivocal language, and showed that all evil is "set in the perfect knowledge of the living God, who will by no means clear the guilty." He spoke of the joy of faith and its power to uplift into the presence of God every soul that exercised it. To these and kindred truths, told in strong, yet simple words, the Wall Street crowds listened reverently.

One day, Mr. Wilkinson said: "I want you who have begun a new religious life; you who have had your spiritual life deepened; you to whom Christ is a Saviour; you who are a little wiser and better because of these open air services in the presence of God, who knows all hearts, to hold up your hands." Instantly more than two hundred men held up their hands. One man said at the close of the service: "My wife is a Virginian. I belong to this State. We both have become Christians."

Another said: "I belong to a Baptist Church in Brooklyn. My soul was never more blessed in any services than in these."

An elder in a Presbyterian Church wrote the committee, that he "Thanked God for the Wall Street Mission." This man with others, unknown to the preacher, went to the Rev. Morgan Dix and asked to be allowed the use of old Trinity Church for the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson to deliver a Thanksgiving service in on October 6. The Rector of Trinity complied.

It has been thus shown that in one of the busiest streets in the world, and in the busiest hours of the day, many men can be reached by the Gospel. One of the leading bankers on the street sent for the preacher, and said he had been greatly pleased with the services. He tendered the use of a room in his offices as the preacher's headquarters during the meetings. At the close of the Wall Street Mission, Mr. Wilkinson returns to Minneapolis, to take up his ordinary work in that city, where he has lived for nearly eighteen years.

An Ideal Gift

I have no words to express my gratitude to you for the manner in which you have executed my commissions. From Canada, from Scotland, and from New Zealand, come earnest praises of the Red Letter Bibles which I have sent to the dear friends there, and all agree that the perfection of packing has been attained in the transmission of these precious volumes, for they all say that, notwithstanding the distance which these books have come, they all arrived without a single scratch. Thank you sincerely. E. L. COUSIN.

How To Always Make Good Bread At Home

MRS. HOUSEKEEPER, do you know the one thing about making bread which, if improperly done, spoils your batches of bread, breaks housewives' hearts, and makes bread making seem a mysterious occult science?

It isn't the recipe, for there are very few recipes which won't lay the foundation of good bread.

And it isn't the materials—for most materials are usually pure.

And housewives have been known to get poor bread even when they've used the very best materials—isn't that so?

Now, the most important thing about bread making is in mixing the flour and liquids and in kneading the dough.

And what makes that so important is those wonderful little plants we call Yeast.

For yeast, you know, when properly combined with the flour, plus ordinary air, produces an element which makes the dough "rise."

So that the yeast and the air must be uniformly mixed with the flour or the dough won't rise uniformly. That's easy to understand, isn't it?

Consequently, in kneading dough, you have to see that the yeast is thoroughly mixed with the flour and that there is plenty of air all through the dough.

Now, to do this by hand is pretty hard for you must pound and knead the dough from twenty to thirty minutes.

Then, if the mixture isn't right, all your hard work is for naught, and no human hand can always insure the right mixture—no matter how experienced that hand may be.

That's why it is so hard, disagreeable, and fussy to make your own bread by hand. Now isn't that right, you Housewives who make your own bread that way?

Yet, it's so easy to make delicious home made bread if you use the Universal Bread Maker. With the Universal you do not require any previous knowledge of breadmaking—all you have to do is to prepare your liquid, containing the yeast, sift your flour, then pour in all the liquid then all the flour—then turn the handle for only three minutes.

Think of that—only 3 minutes. At the end of that time the rod of the

the most important part of the Bread Maker, an exclusive feature we have protected by patents in every country on the globe—will have thoroughly and scientifically mixed the yeast with the flour so that the minute yeast plants are in close touch with all the tiny particles of the flour.

Then the dough will be folded over itself so that plenty of air will be put into it. You see when the Universal Bread Maker has folded the air into the dough this air surrounds each yeast and flour particle, causing the bread to thoroughly rise. Because the air, yeast and flour form the gas that makes dough "rise."

You couldn't do these things by hand, or with any other Bread Maker than the Universal, for there's no way of kneading dough scientifically and thoroughly, other than by the Universal Bread Maker. And there's no disagreeable work—no pounding—or slapping—no back straining.

The Universal Bread Maker invariably makes most delicious home-made bread at the mere cost of 2½c a pound loaf. You pay the baker at least 5c a pound loaf—for just bakers' bread.

If you use only two loaves of bread a day or 730 a year the Universal Bread Maker will save you at least $18.25 a year, or 9 times its cost—the retail price is only $2.00.

You can buy the Universal Bread Maker at your local dealer's.

We have a book on the Universal Bread Maker, telling what it does and why it saves at least $18.25 a year, which we'll gladly send you free.

Just drop us a postal. Address

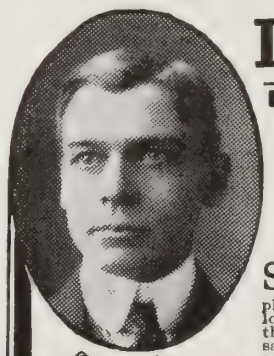
I Am the Paint Man



O. L. Chase
St. Louis, Mo.

Let Me Give You 2 Gallons of My Paint As a Test

SUPPOSE you went to a store and the man placed 2 full gallons of paint on the counter and said "Here is some paint I want you to try before you buy. Just spread these 2 gallons on your walls. When you have done so, if the paint is entirely satisfactory, come in and buy the balance of your order. If not, these 2 gallons are a present from me as a test."

You would think it was a mighty fair offer, wouldn't you?

But no paint dealer ever makes this kind of an offer. * * *

I am not keeping a paint store.
I am running a paint factory.
My paint is not sold over the counter.
I sell it direct from my factory to the user fresh.

Let me make you a better and more liberal offer than the above.

Here it is.

Let me ship you an order of paint. I will pay all freight on 6 gallons or more.

You sign no contract, obligation, or send me a penny of money in advance.

When the paint arrives choose any 2 full gallons of the order, spread it on your building—it will cover 600 square feet, 2 coats—then you be the judge as to whether you want to use the balance of the order or not.

If not, return the balance of the paint—I will pay the freight back and the 2 gallons used are yours, free, for the test.

If the paint spreads better—further—and looks better than any paint you ever saw, and you want to use the balance of the order, keep it and pay me at the end of 6 months.

With the paint I send my pen-and-ink signed iron-clad Guarantee that it will last 8 years.

This Guarantee is binding and says "money back at the end of the Guarantee period if the paint is not as represented."

The reason I can make you this liberal offer is because I manufacture and sell paint in a new way.

My pigment, or paint base,—which is white lead, zinc, coloring matter and drier—is ground fresh to order after your order is received, hermetically sealed in cans, dated the day it is packed, and shipped in separate cans from the oil.

My Pure Old Process Linseed Oil is shipped in a twin can.

My paint is ready to use but NOT ready mixed.

There are reasons for my manufacturing and selling this way. Good reasons.

Reasons that permit me to give an 8 Year Guarantee.

Briefly, here they are:
Paint pigment is a mineral,
Pure linseed oil is a vegetable.

When packed together the chemical action of the mineral pigment eats the life out of the oil—that shortens the life of the paint.

Old process linseed oil is scarce on the market.

Oil used in ready mixed paint is usually adulterated.

My oil is pure.

Shipping it separately gives you a chance to prove it.

Ready mixed paint settles—a cement-like substance forms in the bottom of every can. This can never be properly mixed again by hand.

My method of shipping pigment and oil separately, does away with all settling. You can use every drop out of every gallon of my paint on your walls, and you get the full life of the paint on your buildings.

I want to tell you more about my plan.

Just drop me a line today, asking for my Paint Book, copy of my Guarantee, and other printed matter, which includes my feee instructions "This Little Book Tells How to Paint." They are all FREE.

Do it now while you think of it.

JOHN ALEXANDER DOWIE, of Zion City, has been stricken with paralysis. He was on his way to his new colony in Mexico, in which he is greatly interested, when he was overcome on the train. He has sent a letter to his flock at Zion City, announcing that he has chosen his successor, but he refuses to reveal his name. The announcement will come after Mr. Dowie's death.

PROFESSOR EARLE OF COLUMBIA, one of the most noted teachers of classical philology in the world, died recently after a short illness. He was still a young man, having been born in New York City in 1864. He graduated from Columbia in 1886. Later he was an instructor in Barnard College and in Bryn Mawr College. He was the author of numerous books and magazine articles connected with the object to which he had devoted his life.

The Calabrian Earthquake

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FRONT COVER

FOR centuries the people of Southern Italy have been accustomed to earthquakes, and, if the shock were not too severe, would cross themselves, shrug the shoulders, and say, "It does not matter." During the last month, however, the earth in its unrest has shaken its back until all Italy has been filled with alarm, and the province of Calabria has become the land of tears.

During the month of August, the peasants in the vineyards had felt a tremor now and then beneath their feet. The vines would shiver as if shrinking from an unseen blast. Then as the Calabrians looked and listened, there would come from the hills a distant rumble, ending in a long sighing sound, as if the world was yawning and stretching as it roused itself from its long sleep. At last, in September, the earth groans became more intense, and on the night of September 8, shock after shock brought cottage and palace, fortress and cathedral spire, crumbling to the ground. People rushed into their churches and threw themselves in supplication before the shrines, only to find the massive walls toppling about them. Hundreds thus met death in one of its most horrible forms. Here and there throughout Calabria might be seen men, women, and children, tugging frantically at broken columns and piles of debris beneath which their loved ones were buried.

The King of Italy, as soon as the extent of the disaster became known, started for Calabria, regardless of personal peril. He went over the entire district, directing, assisting even with his own hands. He gave a large amount from his own purse to clothe and feed his distressed subjects. Nothing that the King and his government could think of to alleviate suffering was left undone. It is such acts as these that have so endeared the present dynasty to the warm hearts of the Italians. All of them, grandfather, father and son, in war, plague and earthquake, have been among the first at the front, the last to leave the point of danger.

A drummer in some towns announced the coming of relief. When Victor Emmanuel arrived at Stefanaconi the children crowded about him, frantically kissing his hands and feet. It was at Stefanaconi that the peasants think a miracle has been wrought. The church is but a pile of bricks and mortar, but the image of the town's patron saint still stands, uninjured, in its niche above the altar, three hundred people being killed.

Monteleone, the old hill home of Cicero, suffered severely. In the surrounding country thirty-five villages were destroyed and forty thousand people were rendered homeless, nothing being standing which would afford shelter of any sort. The Italian soldiers performed wonders here, rescuing people from demolished houses and building temporary shelters. The condition of the large church at Parghelia shows well the power of the last shock. The side walls were scaled down as nicely as if they had been removed by expert stonemasons. Amid the ruins of one house a girl was discovered who had been imprisoned by debris for nearly four days. The town of Pizzo was destroyed but only four people were killed. The people are now living in tents, as they are also at Reggio, where the people have taken refuge near the cathedral.

The crops were destroyed, and if it were not for the prompt assistance rendered, famine would add its terrors to the present desperate situation. The southern part of Italy has been put back in material growth for a century, and she well deserves the assistance that is being rendered by the sister provinces of the north.

A HILL TALE

A Blunt Old Colorado Miner on Postum

A clergyman may be eloquent, may use the choicest language, dressing his earnest desire to help his fellow-man in the most elevated, chaste and beautiful language, and yet not touch the hearts of his hearers. Another man, having little education and no grace of speech whatsoever, may tell his message in the common, every-day vernacular he is used to, and the simple faith that glows within him carries quick conviction with it. Such a man writes from the towering peaks of Colorado, preaching of Postum:

"I had drank coffee all my life until it about killed me, when I concluded to try Postum, and in a short time I got relief from the terrible misery I suffered from coffee.

"When I drank coffee I bloated up so that I could not breathe at times; my nerves were so shaky that I could not hold myself still.

"But thanks to Postum I am all well now and can say that I hope to remain so.

"I was very much disgusted with it the first time I tried it, but had it made stronger and boiled longer till it tasted as good as good coffee."

No amount of rhetorical frills and literary polish could add to the convincing power of the old miner's testimony. Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

SAFE FROM ATTACK

WHEN YOU KNOW JIU-JITSU

What would you do if attacked by a thug at close quarters? You never know when you may meet with such an attack.

This is only one reason why every man and woman should know Jiu-Jitsu, especially women. With Jiu-Jitsu strength and size count for naught. It enables a little woman to overthrow a big, powerful man. It therefore affords sure protection from attack by thieves and thugs.

You do not have to be strong to win with Jiu-Jitsu.

Nor do you have to practice much to excel at it, but if you care to practice this perfect form of exercise, it will develop great strength more quickly than any other method of exercise known. It also teaches quickness, lightness, agility and grace of movement.

A Free Lesson From the Greatest Master

To prove how easy it is to master the secrets of this fascinating art, in your own home, without apparatus of any kind, and to show you the difference between the real Jiu-Jitsu and the imitations that are being advertised, Mr. Y. K. Yabe, formerly director of the Ten-Shin Ryu School of Jiu-Jitsu in Japan, will send to anyone writing for it a complete lesson in real Jiu-Jitsu free of all charge.

What the Real Jiu-Jitsu Is

The art of Jiu-Jitsu as taught by Mr. Yabe is the method of physical training, and the system of offence and defence, used by the Imperial Japanese soldiers for thousands of years. Much of the efficiency of this method is due to a number of simple but easy tricks, by which an assailant can be overcome.

Until recently it has been a crime of high treason for anyone to disclose these secrets outside of the Imperial Schools, but Mr. Yabe secured permission from the Mikado to teach these arts in the United States.

If you wish to learn the art of self-defence; If you wish to know the tricks and secrets which will enable you to overcome anyone; If you wish to know the system which has made the Japanese the hardiest, strongest, bravest and toughest people in the world, notwithstanding their small size; If you wish to enjoy perfect health and to indulge in fascinating exercises that make you strong and vigorous, write to-day for Mr. Yabe's free lesson and full particulars of the art of Jiu-Jitsu.

SYMPATHY

Is there not a message very timely at this season, at all seasons it may be, for some of us, who might lend a helping hand to the one described in the poem, which is selected from an exchange.

The fellow who fights the fight alone,
With never a word of cheer,
With never a friend his help to lend,
With never a comrade near—
'Tis he has need of a stalwart hand
And a heart not given to moan—
He struggles for life and more than life,
The fellow who fights alone!

The fellow who fights the world alone,
With never a father's smile,
With never a mother's kindly tone
His sorrowful hours to guile,
Who joins the fray at the dawn of day,
And battles till light is flown,
Must needs be strong, for the fight is long—
The fellow who fights alone!

Ah, bitter enough the combat is,
With every help at hand,
With friends at need to bid godspeed,
With spirits that understand;
But fiercer far is the fight to one
Who struggles along unknown—
Oh, brave and grim is the heart of him,
The fellow who fights alone!

God bless the fellow who fights alone,
And arm his soul with strength!
Till safely out of the battle rout
He conquering comes at length;
Till far and near into every ear
The fame of his fight is blown.
Till friend and foe in the victor know
The fellow who fights alone!

Home for Sick Missionaries

FROM United States Consul-General Fowler, at Chefoo, China, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter containing very encouraging information regarding the progress of the new Missionary Rest Home in that city. The building is now almost completed, and it promises to be a very satisfactory one for the proposed work. For the site, the managers paid $3,346 (Mex.), and for the building itself $15,300 (Mex.) had been expended up to April 14. Contributions from all sources (including $1,000 gold from the proprietor of this journal) were in the neighborhood of $12,000 (Mex.) leaving a considerable deficit. Besides the structure itself, there will be additional expense in furnishing, draining land, laying out grounds, building wells, finishing interiors of rooms, etc., making the whole sum yet to be raised about $17,000 (Mex.), or $8,500 gold, a dollar Mexican being equal to fifty cents American.

The new building is specially designed as a "rest home" for missionaries and Christian workers, who have become temporarily invalided through their labors in the trying Chinese climate, and who would be greatly helped by a brief stay at Chefoo, which is in a comparatively salubrious section. This is the project to which Dr. Klopsch sometime ago contributed $1,000, believing it to be a most worthy one. Any contributions in aid of the work will be acknowledged in these columns.

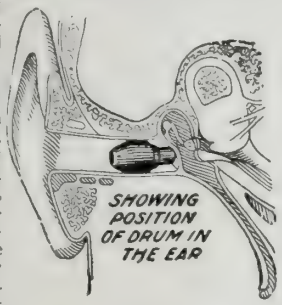
Good News to the Deaf lechanical Ingenuity is Successful Where Medical Skill Fails.

eorge P. Way, An Electrical Engineer of Detroit, Mich., has Invented a Successful Artificial Ear Drum

Twenty-five years ago, after a severe attack typhoid fever, Geo. P. Way, the electrical gineer of Detroit's Y. M. C. A., noticed his aring was impaired. Each year found Mr. ay more deaf til he practally lost all se of sound. course, durg the growth this affliction Way had ied every own method obtain relief, d while powful Ear Trumps gave some sistance they re not satisftory. Then it s that Mr. Way applied his knowledge of echanics and his skill as an inventor to his n problem.



ne day, when placing a peculiarly shaped ft of cotton in his ear, Mr. Way was prised to find he could hear fairly well. arting from this basis and working upon the nciple of the telephone transmitter, Mr. ay made his first Ear Drum. This first ort was very crude, but it helped his hearing d he tried again. Years were devoted to perimenting and to the study of the human r from a mechanical standpoint until at last rfect success crowned the efforts of the an who had become known as "The Deaf gineer of Detroit."

Like nearly all great inventions, Mr. Way's nder-working device attracted the attention prominent business men in his own city. reful investigation was made into the rits of the drums, physicians were consulted d experiments were made with hundreds of es of deafness. The result was the foundatn of a company financially able to guarantee t all claims for Mr. Way's invention could substantiated.

The drum is scientifically constructed from peculiarly sensitized material molded to fit ctly the opening to the inner ear and is irely invisible.

Note in the illustration its peculiar ape — exhaustive experiments have oven that unless an artificial drum ls these exact curves the sound waves e not caught as they should be. Note ain how the drum is narrowed down a small tube just where it strikes the tural ear drum. This feature alone most valuable as it intensifies the und waves and makes hearing posble even for those who have almost tirely lost all sense of sound.

Remember that these drums are entirely ferent from any other artificial aid to aring, and that the above features are ongly protected by patents and are found no other drums except the WAY.

Write a frank statement of how you became af, how long your hearing has been defective d how much trouble you have with your rs. A Cheering Message

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IT was with the Jews returned from exile, as it always is with a true child of God, a question whether they would fear God, and trust him, or whether they would fear man and fall back upon their own resources. Haggai had come with a trumpet call. Zechariah comes with visions of God, an eye open for the unseen, and he puts in a concrete form the truth which alone can secure victory to a fallible child of God: "Not by might [lit., an army], nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." It was not to be a question of army against army, or man against man; the battle was the Lord's.

Zechariah's vision was of a candlestick all of gold (Israel as the light of the world). Let us read ourselves into this vision. We, the Church of Christ, are God's candlestick at the present time, and dimly indeed as the light is burning, we are the only light which the poor lost world has, until our Lord shall come again. Zechariah saw the candlestick, or lamp, with its bowl to hold the oil on the top of it, and its seven lamps or lights —seven being the perfect number—to signify how Israel was intended to illuminate the whole world, and will do so when Christ reigns in Mount Zion.

In these days, in which God is pouring out his Spirit here and there, and a great cry is going up to him that he would now pour out his Spirit upon all flesh (Acts 2: 17), he needs sons of oil to be his branches, his instruments. But these are they who must be humble enough and contrite enough in heart for him to dwell in them (Isa. 57: 15); such as will not despise "the day of small things," willing to be nothing in their own eyes, and in the eyes of others, willing to take no credit, to be despised, thwarted, misunderstood, opposed by men, without resisting in any other way than by committing their cause to him whose cause is committed to them. Where God finds such he can build the wall which has been broken down between the world and the Church and can prepare a people for his coming. Shall we fail him, or shall we, by persistently believing in him, in spite of all appearances, lend ourselves to him as sons of oil, which, through the golden pipes, are used to keep the light of God burning in the dark world until he come?

Can we do otherwise than recall our commission to go "into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark 16: 15)? And can we do other than learn from the Old Testament vision how, and by what power, this is to be accomplished? In the candlestick there was a pipe to every lamp. The candlestick was not to be dressed once a day, like an ordinary lamp, but to have a continual, unfailing supply of oil, to keep the light burning. The well of water must spring up unto everlasting life, that the river of water may flow out into the lost world by its constant connection with the Source: "He that believeth on me" (John 4: 14; 7: 38, 39).

In the vision of the prophet he saw not only the lamps and the pipes, but also the supply: "Two olive trees by it; one on the right side of the bowl and the other upon the left side thereof." Zechariah inquired, "What are these, my Lord? Then the angel that talked with me answered and spake unto me, saying, This is the word unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." If this was the clue of the whole situation, then Zechariah could understand how much God could be gloried in his people's steady, quiet obedience to him, in prosecuting the work of building just when everything seemed so against them, because it gave him the opportunity to manifest himself as the ruler of kings, and the master of circumstances, and he who will not give his glory to another.

OUR COMING ROYAL GUEST

The Visit of Prince Louis of Battenberg to the United States

OFFICIALS of the United States Government, from the President down, have made elaborate preparations for the entertainment of Prince Louis of Battenberg and his staff, who, with one of the finest squadrons of the British navy, will spend the first half of the month of November in American ports.

Lady Durand, the Hostess

A royal visitor from a friendly European power is always assured a certain amount of attention, if he comes to the United States in an official capacity, and as a Rear-Admiral in the British Navy, the officers of which have been most hospitable to their Yankee brethren, Britain's sailor prince is sure of an especially warm welcome.

The entertainment provided for Prince Louis and his suite is similar in many respects to that provided for other distinguished callers from the Old World. It will afford an opportunity to demonstrate the cordial relations that exist between the two great English-speaking nations. The programme embraces a reception and banquet at the White House at Washington; visits to our famous training schools at Annapolis and West Point, and various social festivities in New York City. Not the least interesting event in connection with the visit will be the entertainment of the enlisted men on board the visiting British vessels by the blue-jackets of our North Atlantic squadron, who have raised by subscription more than $10,000 with which to play host to their English cousins.

Prince Louis of Battenberg is German by birth, but a British subject by adoption, and the last surviving of three brothers in whom the late Queen Victoria took a motherly interest. Moreover, he is wedded to Princess Victoria of Hesse, Queen Victoria's favorite granddaughter. From the standpoint of worldly possessions, Prince Louis was not exactly a matrimonial prize for Princess Victoria, for he has only a comparatively small estate in Hess, together with a modest income; but the couple have had an ideally happy married life. Indeed, Princess Victoria has found her lot far less stormy and exacting than her sisters, one of whom married the Czar of Russia, and another of whom was the wife of the late Grand Duke Sergius of Russia.

It has been said that Prince Louis owes his present high rank in the British Navy to his marriage into the royal family, but unprejudiced persons who are in a position to judge, declare that he has won all his rewards by ability and downright hard work. He entered the British Navy long before he married Princess Victoria. From early boyhood he cherished an ambition to become a sailor, and his family, seeing that it was useless to attempt to make anything else out of him, finally gave their consent and aided him to obtain a cadetship in the British Navy at the age of fourteen.

PRINCE LOUIS OF BATTENBERG
In the uniform of a British Admiral

The titled lad fared no better, however, than the ordinary midshipman. He learned his profession in the days of masts and sails, and went around the world under canvas. In the year 1874, when he was twenty years of age, he was made a sub-lieutenant, and two years later, won promotion to the rank of lieutenant. That was still his rank when, in 1884, he married the Queen's granddaughter. A year later, he was made a commander; but then ensued a lapse of six years ere he advanced to the coveted position of captain.

Prince Louis, who is now in his fifty-first year, is a tall, active, handsome, black-bearded man, genial and democratic, although he has the reputation of being a strict disciplinarian. As a naval officer he has manifested a scientific turn of mind and has evolved several valuable inventions, among others the first system of long-distance signaling on shipboard.

Another helpful device which was the product of his ingenuity, is what is known as a "course indicator"—a machine whereby the officer of the watch on board a vessel can accurately determine the location and course of the other ships belonging of a fleet.

The ships which Prince Louis brings to our Atlantic coast compose the most formidable squadron that has ever called at the ports of the United States on a peaceful mission. All of the ships are first-class armored cruisers; they are among the newest and finest ironclads built by Great Britain and speedier than any similar craft in our navy, being capable of traveling through the water at the express-train gait of more than twenty six miles per hour. Prince Louis and his fleet spent some time in the Mediterranean, and made an extended visit to Canada before sailing for the United States. Altogether, his cruise will cover more than eight months.

Prince Louis' approaching visit recalls the cordial welcome that was accorded to Prince Henry of Prussia, on the occasion of his American tour several years ago, the magnificent demonstrations that greeted him in a number of our cities, and especially the brilliant naval display in his honor. It also revives memories of the visit of Albert Edward, then Prince of Wales and now King of England, to this country in 1859-60. There are many yet living who will remember the young English prince's public appearances in various cities and the furore they excited. One of the notable incidents of his American sojourn was his visit, accompanied by several members of his staff, to the tomb of Washington.

THE PEACE CONGRESS AT LUCERNE

BY LUCIA AMES MEAD

ON the shores of the most beautiful lake, in the most beautiful country of the world, the Fourteenth International Peace Congress ended its five days' session on September 23 by an impressive mass meeting.

One great cause for rejoicing among the Americans at Lucerne was the size of their delegation, which was six times larger than any held since the Congresses were revived, fifteen or twenty years ago. It numbered sixty, and was exceeded only by the English delegation of seventy. One of the most valuable results of any International Congress is the opportunity it gives for the study of diverse physiognomies. Here a young diplomat from the Chinese legation in Paris, comes in native costume, and talks to us in French of the "white peril" which China now faces. Here is the American minister to Portugal, formerly our Minister to Brazil, with a wealth of experience in regard to the needs of South America. One touches elbows at one moment with our former Minister to Holland, who has something to say on the Venezuelan decision of the Hague Court, and the next minute one is listening to an old Garibaldian soldier, a leader in Italy's peace movement, who is urging a rapprochement between Austria and Italy, similar to that just established between England and France. Here is the Baroness von Suttner, whose famous novel, Down with Your Arms, translated into nearly every European language, has made her the best known woman in the world in the peace movement. Here, too, is that delightful and cosmopolitan friend of peace, Felix Moscheles, whose wit and eloquence are expressed with equal ease in three languages. Almost every delegate present has a history and a mission.

Probably no man present had a more important message than Timothy Richard, for thirty-six years a Welsh missionary in China, and recently raised by the Chinese to the rank of mandarin of the first order. His present mission to Europe is to arouse the nations to a realization of the growth of Asiatic militarism, as a direct result of insolence and aggression on the part of so-called Christian nations. The cruelty and pillaging of which the allied armies were guilty while suppressing the Boxers, is fresh in the minds of those Asiatics, who, stimulated by Japanese success, are preparing to oppose Western armies and navies with a force which, twenty years hence, will far exceed Japan's, and will be a menace to the world. That China is aroused to the revolution in educational and governmental methods which this involves, is certain.

Mr. Richard came to England last year as an unofficial representative of the Chinese Foreign Office at Peking, to present China's hope that European nations would federate with her and secure her protection from invasion and partition, and thus enable her to forego the frightful burden of taxation which her new policy would necessitate. As secretary of the "Society for the Diffusion of Christian and General Knowledge," Mr. Richard has rendered valuable aid in the work of transforming China. When it is remembered that 4,000,000 Chinese are born every year, and, that the new converts through preaching, number less than 50,000, it is evident that more comprehensive and rapid methods must be employed than work among the peasants. Educate a mandarin or future viceroy, and get the ear of the men in power, and the policy of the empire, and indirectly that of Asia, may be mightily affected. The most important matter that came before the Congress has been that which was uppermost at the Inter-Parliamentary Congress at Brussels last month, and was presented by our American members there. This included the subjects which should be recommended for consideration at the Second Hague Conference. The specific recommendations which the Congress makes are these: For the limitation of armaments; the establishment of a World Congress; the organization of an Administrative Bureau, and the cohesion between all the nations represented in the Conference of a permanent, obligatory Arbitration Treaty.

The Beautiful Swiss City of Lucerne, where the Congress was Held

The only disappointment to most of us Americans was that the proposition sent by the Massachusetts Board of Trade was left without approval. This was for the neutralization of the zone on the Atlantic, which is the great highway of commerce. There was not sufficient time for discussion of this resolution, and no vote was taken on it. The failure to carry such an important matter indicates certain difficulties of administration of the Congress as at present constituted, and new regulations in regard to procedure are to be agreed upon before the Congress of next September, which is to be held in Milan.

One helpful feature of the Congress was the emphasis laid by Mr. Edwin Ginn of Boston upon the need of a far greater co-operation of practical business men in the work of peace propaganda. The appeal made last autumn at the Congress in Boston for the price of a battleship for the peace propaganda, has resulted in the beginning of a fund of $100,000, by the American Peace Society, $20,000 of which is already promised. Among other results is a beginning of an international fund under the control of the Berne Bureau, which is the centre of the international peace work. A German Baron who was at the Congress in Boston, was deeply impressed. He has become one of its most earnest supporters, and quietly added $2,000 to the new fund of the Berne Bureau.

Baroness Von Suttner

But the largest response to a call for more generous work in peace propaganda came like an electric shock toward the close of the final session, in regard to a Peace Museum. One feature of the week's programme had been a visit to the War and Peace Museum, situated in a huge picturesque building on the borders of the lake, where, for five years, Lucerne has given free rental to the Museum founded by the famous Polish economist, Jean de Bloch. He believed that the presentation of the increased complexity and cost of armaments, and the picturesque portrayal of the horrors of war would lead to a perception of the futility of modern warfare. He therefore engaged military experts to arrange a series of weapons, diagrams, raised maps, charts etc., filling room after room of the vast edifice, through which about 70,000 persons pass annually, it being one of the sights of Lucerne. The Peace department of the Museum was scarcely begun before Bloch's death left it in a sadly bare and deficient condition. This disappointing condition was presented to the Congress, and an appeal was made for funds to give it a permanent habitation and to improve it. Sitting in the audience was an unobtrusive little man, looking like a modest Swiss, who simply sent up word that he would give 500,000f., and if necessary 200,000f. more to the museum, on the sole condition that it should be wholly a Peace Museum, with only enough of the military element to show the results of war. The donor proved to be another Pole, Count Gourowsky of Nice. This act places him at the head of the list of givers for peace propaganda.

One feature of the Congress which seemed most hopeful, was the reception of an English representative of 2,000,000 trades-unionists, whose manly, earnest speech won respect and admiration.

An important resolution was passed on a matter proposed by Prof. Richtl of Paris, to the effect that, money being as essential for war as guns, it should be considered contraband and public loans should not be permitted to be advertised. This could not prevent private loans, but would make them more difficult and in disrepute, and would shorten war.

Special interest attended the words of M. Jean Novicow of Odessa, a notable economist and author of The Federation of Europe. It is no longer of Europe's federation that he speaks, but he now demands world federation. His sympathies in the recent war were with Corea and Manchuria, as opposed to those of Russia or Japan. In a masterly address, he traced the economic misconceptions that lead to wars, and showed that Antwerp alone has more commerce than all Russia, and Switzerland, without a navy or colonies, has more commerce per capita than England.

How terribly the wealth of the world is misspent to-day, was suggested by the fact, that, in spite of endless resources and modern science, nine hundred men out of every thousand on the planet have not enough to eat.

Spite of wretched weather during the whole week, one lake excursion to the historic Rutli was smuggled in between showers, and two brilliant banquets and one or two receptions and entertainments added greatly to the pleasure of the week. The town was brilliantly illuminated one evening, and the hospitable Swiss people left us their debtors for their generous efforts on our behalf, which were greatly appreciated.

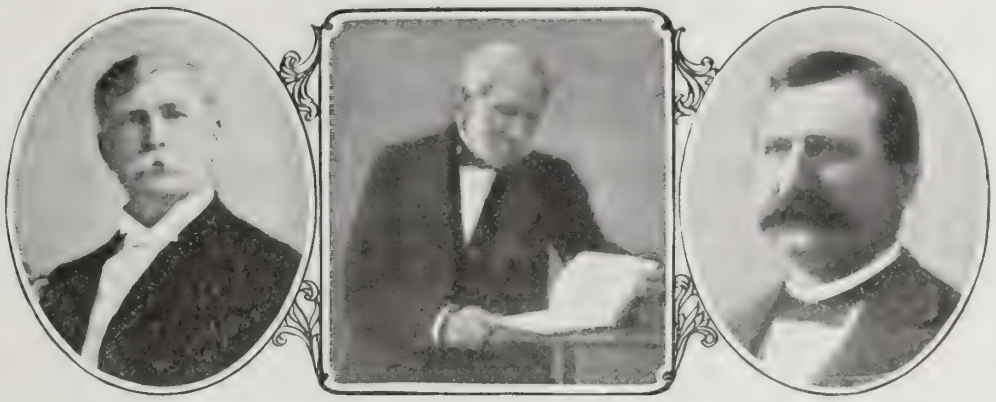
SHEPHERDING THE LOST LAMBS

THE KANSAS CHILDREN'S HOME SOCIETY AND ITS HUMANITARIAN MISSION



Rev. O. S. Morrow
Superintendent

Judge J. T. Clark
President of the Society

S. S. Ott
Treasurer

NEARLY fifty years ago, the Children's Aid Society of New York began sending to Kansas numbers of waifs—orphans and destitute children—from the slums of New York city. Until, from that Society alone, nearly five thousand of these little ones were received and provided with homes. From east of the Mississippi other cities besides New York sent children, until the number reached a total of something over ten thousand. The antecedents, and even the surnames, of many of these children were wholly unknown.

Kansas is among the few States that annually appropriate State funds to small denominational orphanages and other charities (Catholic, Protestant, or colored), that in some way these waifs are always cared for. Moreover, the States sending them continue to exercise a sort of supervision over the children.

Happily, most of these little waifs have turned out well. There is such a large sprinkling of warm-hearted people scattered over the wind-swept prairies of Kansas, that, no matter where these little bits of humanity alighted they fell into good hands, for the simple reason that home people more often desert their own than adopt children of others.

Running like a scarlet thread through all this work is the underlying law of recompense that sympathy—not simply charity—is forever on the side of the "waif"; that sympathy is God's own key to the money purse, the outside door of the comfortable home. Time makes it all women out of these once helpless waifs, and from their ranks come those who are ready to help others. Among them we have had Senators and House members, and a Governor; among them have also been men and women of great influence in their own communities and in our educational field.

H. G. Preston

The Kansas Children's Home Society is an interdenominational, yet a thoroughly Christian organization, so simple, so frictionless and expressive in action, as to have practically revolutionized the value and treatment of the homeless child problem in that State at least. It was brought into Kansas thirteen years ago, by the Rev. O. S. Morrow, a lover of children. Let me give some instances that will illustrate the methods employed.

Fifteen years ago, Harry came under the care of the Society. He was placed and replaced, each family giving its impress upon him. Some said, "He is of a worthless account." Others, "He is too lazy to earn salt." While others insisted that he should be sent to the reform school. One day, after he had cost the Society so much time and money that a change of treatment must be adopted, Mr. Morrow said, "Harry, what shall I do with you? Have you no pride, no ambition, no sense of obligation either to yourself or to God?" This tall, shiftless, awkward boy of fifteen said, "Yes, I'd like to learn railroading; I would like to go into a freight office." "Well," said Mr. Morrow cheerfully, "let us go right down to the —— freight office." The opportunity opened, and he began station work on a railroad in Oklahoma. To-day he has charge of a station, draws a good salary and has hunted a home for mother and two little sisters and is giving them a good home, although he is not yet twenty-one years of age. And, best of all, he is an earnest Christian, not ashamed of his colors, and a power for good among men.

Early in his work, Mr. Morrow began framing some much needed laws for the protection of these waifs, and to his first surprise in the knowledge that there were men in both Houses of the Legislature who had formerly belonged to this same, sad little crew. With their support, laws were easily passed. Occasionally, one of these laws would work against some other law in a most perplexing way. Soon after the passage of the bill preventing keeping children in Alms Houses, and the bill, called "Fees and Salary Bill," we found a child in the almshouse in —— county. We called on the probate judge and explained the system of the Children's Home Society, and asked for the boy, adding, "Some counties allow us fifty dollars, when the child is wholly dependent on the county." "I am going to send Tom to the Reform School," he said. "What do you find him guilty of?" "Mrs. ——," (mentioning the name of the wife of a well-known county officer), "says she has known him since the day his mother died, and her parents have brought him up with the utmost care. She says there isn't a bad thing about him." Just then the deputy sheriff came in with another ten-year-old boy, saying, "Here is a boy with no relatives, and he won't even mind me." As they talked, we asked the boy how old he was? He replied, "Ten in July." "Where is your home?" "I've been living with Aunt Jane; she died last week. I am living nowhere now." "Why did you not mind the sheriff?" "He flung my cap out into the weeds and told me not to go for it. I thought he was only foolin'." "And you climbed out of the back of the cart and ran after your cap?" "Yes'em."

While they were talking, a man and woman entered the judge's office with another small boy. His mother had died a year before; his father had put him on the farm with his uncle, and had gone to Texas, and they did not know where he was. The uncle and aunt had come to apply for a divorce, and neither of them would keep the boy. We explained what the Society could do for these three little boys, and pleaded for the boys to be given to the Society. The judge said, "I am just on the eve of my re-election, and can't bother with your Society. If you want these boys follow them to the Reform School and take them. Expostulation was useless. The papers consigning these three boys were made out, and they went to the Reform School.

Mr. Morrow and his field secretaries have found and placed in permanent homes nearly eight hundred destitute children. Few instances are recorded where any children have been abused or become criminal, and fully ninety-five per cent still live, though they were in wretched condition when found. Homes for babies are most easily procured.

Mrs. Wilson, wife of a business man, said to the writer, "Charlie, the young man who waited on you at table, and of whose parentage we know nothing, has been my heart-comfort for fifteen years. He always thinks of mother first, and never complains because some other child is better off than he is, and never tells me what I should or should not do, as my own children often do."

The general business of the Society is in the hands of the State Board of Managers, which has an executive committee that meets with the State Superintendent each month to receive his reports and those of his district superintendents, and to audit accounts. All the reports of the district superintendents are sent weekly to the State superintendent with all subscription lists, itemized statements of receipts and expenses, and the information necessary for a complete record of the children received, placed, or replaced. No child is received into the care of the Society, and placed or replaced, without the concurrence of the State and district superintendent, with the advice of the Local Advisory Board in the communities, both where the child is found and also where it is placed. Every family receiving a child must be recommended as kind-hearted, humane, mentally, morally and financially competent, and in good circumstances, and socially situated so as to give a child good advantages, good social companionships and a good education.

The Kansas society now employs six district superintendents or field secretaries, who constantly travel in the interest of children needing homes, or homes wanting children. It has nearly two thousand local advisory boards in as many communities, who are eyes, and ears, and hands for the Society whenever needed. The entire system is simply an organized protest against consigning children to orphanages or institutions. Instead, it places them directly in homes, either by adoption or contract. The Society is legally bound for the support and conduct of the child, and must place and replace it until it finds a satisfactory home. Parents can become "lost" to a child, and no law has yet been devised to prevent it, but the Society, having eyes and ears over so wide an extent, cannot be "lost" to the child. From the hour the child is found, until it is placed in a permanent home, it is a charge upon the Society. Summing up each child's expense, some being more than others, it will average seventy-five dollars for each child handled—less than the sum it costs for placing a child in any reformatory, where the expense to the State is continuous. Counties sometimes grant this seventy-five dollars to the Society when it takes a child who has become a county charge. But the money is mostly solicited through the superintendents. The Society is just now proposing to erect a business block in Topeka, for rent, hoping to thus be able to secure a permanent income. The work, as a whole, is successful, economical,

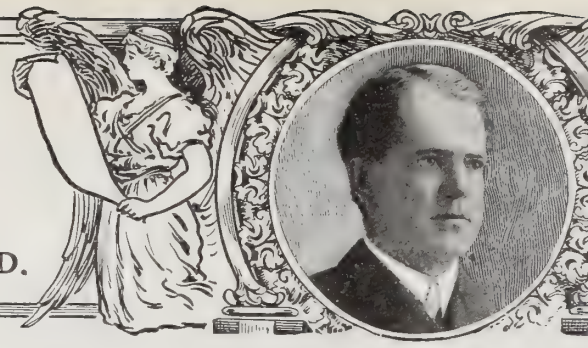
SERMON BY
Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.



An Answer Demanded

TEXT: MATT. 27:22:

"What shall I do then with Jesus who is called Christ?"

THE small, unpretentious house, in which Abraham Lincoln died, is, for the tourist, one of the most interesting places in all Washington. The same fascination which draws the sightseer to the tomb of Mount Vernon, hovers about the little room in which the first martyr-president of the United States breathed his last. There are many Lincoln memorials gathered within the modest house just across the street from Ford's Theatre. One of the most interesting is a pile of papers which contain the "Lincoln sermons," which were preached by some three thousand different ministers in the United States on the Sunday after Lincoln was shot. But if I could take you to-day into a room and show you all the sermons preached upon the death of Abraham Lincoln, I could say with truth they are as nothing in number, compared to the sermons which have been preached upon the trial and death of Jesus Christ. That event has inspired not only preachers but artists. Time and again, have those pathetic events been depicted on the canvas. Probably no artist has succeeded in catching the spirit of the scenes so completely as the Hungarian painter Munkacsy. His two pictures, "Christ before Pilate," and "Christ on Calvary," have made the whole civilized world bow in awe before the sufferings and the death of our Master and King.

The Divine Prisoner

Most of our older people have seen the original painting called "Christ before Pilate." It was carried from city to city in the United States, and placed on exhibition. You recollect how the people entered the room with silent step. You remember how for hours, some of us studied those wonderful typical faces. There were the long beards and the prominent Hebrew features; there were the Pharisees, with their supercilious and condemnatory glances; there were the strange looks of others in a quandary, as much as to say: "What manner of man is this?" There is Christ, oh, so silent and still! You can hear the sneering voices of the multitudes all about him; yet, the defendant himself is saying nothing. And above all others is the great central figure of that picture, Pilate himself. It is not here a picture of Pilate before the "Judgment seat of Christ," but of Christ before Pilate. What is he to do with this Christ? Here are Christ's enemies demanding his execution. Here is justice and right pleading for Christ's vindication. When the people commenced to cry: "Barabbas, Barabbas, Barabbas, give us Barabbas," Pilate turned to them and said: "What shall I do then with Jesus who is called the Christ?" He had to do something with him; he had to either let him go, or to crucify him. What Pilate had to do, you and I must do. What shall we do then with Jesus who is called Christ.

What are you going to do with Jesus, in the first place, as an intellectual fact? Are you going to shut your eyes to his very existence? Are you going to act as if there never was such a person as Jesus? That there never was a being who came into this world working his miracles, and by these miracles proving that he was the Son of God? Are you going to declare there never was a miraculous conception; that there never was any Easter resurrection and that there never was any ascension from Mount Olivet? All these questions are continually facing us, and demanding an answer, the same as the guilt or the innocence of a defendant is before the jury trying a case, or as the guilt or innocence of a condemned murderer is before the governor, or a pardoning board.

The Supernatural Birth

In spite of ourselves, the facts of Christ's life are before us and we must accept or reject the evidence. We start with his birth. Intelligent men and women as we are, we cannot shut our eyes to the historical facts surrounding the nativity of Bethlehem, if we would. The facts may not have been known to Pilate, but in all their impressive significance they confront us. When a young officer at an Indian mess table was ridiculing the idea of the divine birth of Christ, Sir Arthur Wellesley, who afterwards became Napoleon's conqueror, turned to him and said, "Young man, have you ever read Dr. Paley's Evidences of Christianity? No? Then you had better read it before you parade such evidence of ignorance in reference to Christ's birth as you are doing now." These facts of Christ's birth were accessible to Pilate. There were living in Pilate's time the people who had talked to the wise men from the East. There were sages at that time alive, who had told Herod that Christ was to be born in Bethlehem of Judea. And there were men who were ready to confess that this birth of Christ had fulfilled all the predictions of the prophets. Evidences of Christ's birth are within reach of all. We must, like Pilate, accept Christ's birth as the fulfilment of prophecy; or like Pilate, we must shut our eyes to the historical facts.

Confirmed by Miracle

Then the miracles. Pilate may have seen some of the blind men whose eyes Christ had opened, and the deaf men whose ears Christ had unstopped, and the lame men whose crooked limbs Christ had straightened, and those like Lazarus and the boy who was "the only son of his mother and she a widow," whose dead bodies Christ had resurrected. These living witnesses were in Palestine at the time of Pilate, the same as those who have been miraculously healed of their disease of sin are in the world to-day. The Christ who performed his wonders nineteen hundred years ago is the same Christ who is performing his wonders now.

Christ has been able to change the lives of men before our own eyes. We have often seen the transformation. The painter Rigo, some years ago, went to the northern part of Africa to paint pictures of the natives. He had for his first model a Nubian warrior, just arrived in Cairo. No sooner did the nude native see his head and chest being reproduced upon the canvas, than he turned, and, in wild terror, fled. He declared the white man had stolen away his head and half of his body, and stuck them upon a fence to dry. Great was the wonderment of the dusky African at the power of the European artist's brush. But our wonder, in reference to Christ, is even greater than that of the Nubian at the powers of a Rigo. We have seen Christ absolutely change men. Before our very eyes, he has changed their natures, changed their countenances, and changed the whole trend of their lives. He has been working his miracles before us, as he worked his miracles in Pilate's time.

We have the authenticated historical facts of Christ's birth. Like Pilate, we have seen with our eyes the miracles which Christ has wrought. And, like Pilate, we have had our own evidence of Jesus substantiated and reinforced by the testimony of those we love. Our Christian mother's testimony; our Christian fathers and wives and daughters and sons and friends have been pleading with us on behalf of Christ, as Pilate's wife sent her messenger to her husband, pleading with him to do Him justice

A Wife's Appeal

Shall I describe for you this Oriental scene? We are standing in the open judgment hall of Jerusalem. The judge's face is set and troubled. The suppressed sigh, the muttered oath, the growlings and the murmurings of the people, are threatening him. What is Pilate to do? Suddenly a messenger bearing a letter forces his way through the crowd. The governor opens the note and reads. It is written by his wife. At once the troubled face of the Roman governor becomes more troubled. There is the well-known handwriting of his loyal and loving wife. The words burn into his soul. "Have nothing to do with that just Man; for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him." That letter practically meant this: "Dear husband: Do not yield to those crafty Jews. The man before you must be more than mortal. In my dreams, I hear a message from the heavens about Him. I beg of you to protect him, lest the vengeance of God come upon you. Condemn Him not! Condemn Him not!" Thus with us. By the testimony of our fathers, mothers, wives, husbands, children and friends, pleadings are continually going on to-day with us. In great chorus, our loved ones' voices seem to be calling: "Condemn Him not! Condemn Him not! We have had revelations of the power and the divinity of Jesus Christ. Condemn Him not!" We cannot shut our eyes to what we have seen. We cannot stop our ears to what we have heard. Neither, like Pilate, can we turn away from the Christian testimonies which are being given by our loved ones concerning Jesus Christ. I ask you the question which wavering and cowardly Pilate as the Hebrew multitude: "What shall I do then Jesus who is called Christ?" Do you acknowle him as the Son of God? "Yea! Yea!" you must answer. "I do! I do! I do!"

Having intellectually acknowledged Christ as Son of God, the second question is more importun What will you do then with Jesus who is ca Christ, in reference to the will? Are you going to him rule your mind, your thought and your actic When Jesus comes to you and says, "I am Jesus; thou obey me?" Are you going to answer, "" Christ, I know that thou art the Son of God, bu cannot and will not do as thou wouldst have me. cannot yield my will to thine."

Christ demanded of Pilate the same kind of subr sion to his will that the Franciscan monks are com led to give to the head of their Order. The story told that, many centuries ago, a monk refused to ol the great founder of their Order. By the command the leader a grave was dug.

The Refractory Monk

was placed in a standing position in the grave. Tl by the order of St. Francis, the monks began shovel in the dirt. The dirt came to the ankle, to knee, to the hip. "Are you dead yet?" called Francis. "Is your self-will broken. Do you yield my will?" The monk, with set jaw and sullen lo refused to yield. Higher and higher came the s Now to the stomach, now to the chest, now to shoulder. But still the refractory monk refused yield. At last, the dirt came to the lip and to nostril. "Do you yield?" cried St. Francis. "Is y self-will dead?" One shovel more and death was to his. Ay, and then the stubborn will broke, and monk lifted up his beseeching eyes, and, with tremul lip, called, "Father, I am dead. My self-will is de I yield! I yield!" So Christ demands not only us to acknowledge him king of our intelligences, king of our wills. We must submit our will to his w We must obey him even as the Franciscan monks ob their leaders. We must not yield Christ one-third one-half or nine-tenths of our wills; but we must s render unto him complete and absolute obedience.

We must acknowledge Christ as king of the enti will. We have more reason to do so than had Pila though he conceded more than some of us are doing. the first place, he yielded his will to Christ enough f a little while to defy the Hebrew mob. Then, in t next place, he tried to save Christ by a subterfuge. I placed alongside of Jesus one of the worst criminals the East, and then he said, "According to the law, must pardon one of these criminals. Which shall it be He did this with the hope that the people would let hi pardon Christ. Then, when all means failed, he took basin of water and washed his hands before the peopl as he said, "I am innocent of the blood of this ju person; see ye to it." Ah, yes, Pilate did much save Christ, but he did not do enough. With one wo he could have said, "Free! Free!" and Christ wou have been free. He yielded his will to the divine w one-eighth, one-fourth, one-third, one-half, but he d not yield all. "What will you do then with Jes who is called Christ?" In every department of lif will you give to him complete obedience?

Saved by Obedience

Would that Pilate could have realized that in fu submission to Christ, he would have found his own safet I recall the story of the little child of a switchman one of the German railroads. The fast mail was rus ing down the track. The switchman at his post, move the switch to give it a clear track. Suddenly, to th father's horror, the man saw his little boy run upon th rails. The father dared not throw the lever back. would have meant the death of hundreds of person His own boy must be killed, rather than that othe should perish. So the father cried out to the chil "Lie down! Lie flat down!" The boy dropped; th great engine and its coaches swept past. Then it wa found, that, because the boy absolutely yielded his wi to his father's, and lay down flat upon the ground, hi life was saved. Oh that Pilate had obeyed his divin

Father's commands, as that little child obeyed his earthly parent. Would that we could surrender all our wills to God's will. Pilate's half-way attempts to rescue Jesus did no good. Pilate should have been manenough to have gone all the way, no matter what the temporary cost might have been. He should have firmly said: "Jesus, Thou art free."

But to yield our wills to Christ's is not enough. There is another question which I would put: "What are you going to do with Jesus who is called Christ, in reference to your affections or your heart's loving power?" To be obedient to Christ, is not necessarily to be a loving disciple of Christ. There is many a woman trying to be a true and dutiful wife, who, years ago, lost all love for her husband. That husband has again and again broken every one of his vows. She is true to him for her children's sake alone. Thus, I believe, there are many men trying to obey Christ, and yet they are disciples who have not learned to love Christ.

Pilate, in one sense, was trying to serve Christ; but Pilate did not love Jesus any more than some of us love him who have been trying to follow him for years. Why are you a Christian? Why do you go to church and always contribute to the church and have your name enrolled upon the church books? "For two reasons," you may answer. "Church-going is an old habit, and old habits are hard to break. Then, in the next place, though I do not profess to love Christ very much, yet fear the results if I do not follow him. Adoniram Judson was started in the Christian ministry by the death of one of his college-mates. So, because I fear death without Christ, that is the reason I am following him." Now, my friends, your answer is the answer many are ready to give. They worship and follow him, because they are afraid not to do it. Their God is a God of fear, and not a God of love. Now comes the practical question: What are you to do with Christ in reference to your heart's affections?

You must love somebody or something. You cannot help it. The tendrils of the heart will climb up and reach out for an object to love, just as the roots of a tree will reach out to clutch hold of the rocks, or will sink themselves into the earth. As we must love, cannot you and I learn to love Christ? Cannot we begin to study and to learn what he has done for us? In the record of that beautiful life, cannot we learn to love him, as we learned first to love our mothers on account of the sacrifices they have made for us? Then, having realized what the divine love means, cannot we learn to do something for his love's sake? God's love can change our actions towards him, if we will only let it. What are you going to do with Christ in reference to the heart's loving capabilities?

But I cannot close this subject without asking you one more question. What are you going to have your loved ones do with Jesus? You have almost as much influence over some of your loved ones' actions as you have over your own. If Pilate had turned to Christ and said: "Lord Jesus, Thou art my Master. I will yield my heart and life to Thee," do you not believe his own wife would have also accepted Christ? Why, she was already almost persuaded. Furthermore, do you not believe that if you should give your heart to Christ to-day, your actions would be the means of making some of your loved ones surrender their hearts to Jesus?

Often have we read how men and women have rescued their dear ones from physical dangers. Shall we not by the help of Christ save our dear ones from spiritual peril? There is a beautiful story told, that during chivalric times, a knight was captured and imprisoned in a castle. The wife, who had been left behind during the crusade, knew not where her husband was incarcerated. So she took a stringed instrument and, dressed as a page, she wandered from court to court and from country to country, singing under the great fortresses the old love songs with which she had been wooed in her father's castle. One day, as the familiar notes of the minstrel lifted themselves to a frowning fortress, there came back an answering song. Then the wife knew where her husband-lover was imprisoned. By means of her father's friends, she was able to rescue her dear one. So shall it be with us. If we lift our voices in redemption songs, we shall hear our songs echoed back in the redemption songs of our loved ones. As Pilate, in all probability, decided the eternal destiny of his wife as well as his own, when he condemned Christ, so our actions may decide the eternal destinies of our friends as well as our own.

May we weigh carefully the importance of the question which I am about to put. May we weigh it carefully, in reference to our homes, our business associates and our friends at large. "What shall ye do then with Jesus who is called Christ?" I am not asking this question, but Jesus himself is asking it. "What will ye then do with me?" Answer must be given. Then Christ shall give to us an answer which shall affect the eternities. Then, instead of having "Christ before Pilate," we shall have "Pilate before Christ." Oh, what shall Jesus then say unto us? Will he say, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you?" Or shall he say, "Depart from me. Depart from me." God forbid! God forbid!

A Great Gathering of Five Thousand Factory Workmen Listening to the Gospel at the Noon Hour

Open-Air Evangelism
in New York City

THE past season has seen one of the greatest movements ever conducted in New York for the spread of the Gospel and the betterment of humanity. It was believed by many at the beginning, that evangelical work could not be conducted on so broad a scale as was projected, with any great measure of success in New York City. All sorts of discouraging things were said about the carelessness of city dwellers, who would not listen even if the message were brought to their very doors. But now that the tent campaign has ended for the season, what have been the results? To begin with, every one of the doleful prognostications has proved false. City officials gave the Committee every chance to work among the people, while the police were most willingly helpful.

The campaign has not been hindered in its operations for lack of funds. The tents have been crowded nightly and Sunday afternoons with eager listeners. To be sure, all the drinking and fighting has not been eliminated from "Hell's Kitchen" and similar places; but in many a home in these sections a family altar has been erected, before which the formerly careless and profane now bow in humble prayer. Down in Catherine Slip, that resort where the vile and wretched of both sexes are wont to congregate, many a hitherto hopeless soul has heard the good tidings, which have bade it live again. The bottle has given place to the Bible, and a song of victory has been sung. In many a tenement home, fathers are gathering their children about them, while they listen to the Gospel songs sung by voices of childhood, still too young to have lost their fresh sweetness. On the upper East Side, darkness has been exchanged for Gospel light, and the name of Jesus is now spoken with reverence. The Gospel has been faithfully preached to all sorts and conditions of men throughout the metropolis. None have been overlooked, and the "Sweet Story of Old" has been told to rich and poor, black and white, of many nationalities and denominations.

Especially interesting and productive of good have been the meetings held at the Western Electric Company's Works near the Leyland Pier. The five thousand factory workmen employed by this company were addressed every noon by evangelists, their talks being supplemented by singing, a cornet leading. When a minister, an ex-governor from a Southern State, a lawyer, and an employee are found on the same stand in one day, presenting the claims of religion to a great mass of intelligent, attentive workmen, the forming of yet deeper ties between the church and the workshop would seem to follow as a natural sequence. In one such meeting twelve ministers were present. As an outcome of such cordiality between clergy and factorymen, within the last few weeks, an Association for the mutual promotion of evangelistic endeavor has been formed. Rev. George Alexander, D.D., is the president of this new body; Rev. E. T. Sanford, vice-president; Rev. Dubois H. Loux, general secretary; Rev. G. A. MacDonald, treasurer; and Mr. E. D. Sniffin, field secretary. The president, with the two secretaries, will constitute the executive committee of the Association, and will be supported by a body of directors, among whom are, Rev. Robert Bagnall, D.D., Rev. J. H. Hoadley, D.D., Rev. John J. Young, D.D., Rev. George Alexander, D.D., Rev. H. Roswell Bates, Rev. R. K. Hickok, Rev. G. A. MacDonald, Rev. C. W. MacPherson, Rev. H. V. Ross, Rev. John Rowe, Rev. E. T. Sandford, Rev. Wm. H. Scott, Rev. John H. Tate, Rev. Dubois H. Loux, and Messrs. T. F. Carter, F. A. Sullivan, and E. D. Sniffen. The direct object of the society is to acquaint pastors and workmen with each other on the high ground of the furtherance of the Gospel, as co-workers. Men in the shops will become members of the Association on their taking its pledge to encourage a personal interest among their fellow-workmen for church attendance. This pledge reads: "I promise to do something every week that will influence another man to go to church." The noon meetings were started during the past summer by the Abingdon Square evangelists, Dubois H. Loux and Thomas Houston, under the auspices of the Evangelistic Committee of Greater New York. The Committee has closed its work for the season, and the Association is born out of the needs of the hour.

Prominent among the workers in the Summer Campaign have been many well-known women, including Mrs. Margaret Bottome, who has addressed meetings and has been very active in the Flower Mission, and Mrs. E. W. Whittemore, founder of the "Door of Hope." Miss Helen M. Gould has been interested from the very beginning. 1,051 meetings have been held, with a total attendance of 400,000; that there has been a distribution of 200,000 tracts, 500 Bibles, 5,000 Gospel portions, and 100,000 cards.

Killing by Statute

BOTH sides of the "Capital Punishment" problem are very ably set forth in the notable Symposium which appears elsewhere in this issue. Learned judges, governors of States, Congressmen, divines, generals, authors, politico-economists, and men distinguished in various walks of life have expressed, with unusual freedom, their views on this timely topic for the enlightenment of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Never, probably, was there a fairer test of intelligent public opinion on this question.

Although, as was to have been expected, the opponents of capital punishment are in a large majority, there is much that is cogent and reasonable adduced on either side. Defenders of the extreme penalty claim that society needs to be protected, and that the law is the hand of God to smite as well as to shield; that the killer must be killed in order that killing may cease; that the convicted murderer should not be saddled as a life-long burden upon the community, and finally, that if the death penalty were abolished, murder would prevail to a much greater extent than now, as the chief deterring influence would be removed. On the other hand, it is claimed by the opponents of capital punishment that it is illogical, for the reason that the unwillingness of juries to convict, when they know that death will follow such a verdict, often results in defeating justice; whereas, if the extreme penalty were abolished, there would be no such hesitancy. Further, they hold that statutory killing is a relic of barbarism, uncivilized and un-Christian, and one which makes the State itself a criminal.

We commend these letters to a careful reading. That capital punishment—that "revolting feature of our civilization"—is gradually dying out, is doubtless true, but it dies very slowly. Some few countries have already substituted life imprisonment; but not until the world has advanced a good deal farther on the road toward an enlightened Christian civilization, will legal killing disappear. The modern tendency in all laws dealing with crime is reformatory rather than punitive. The time will yet come when society, instead of attempting to abolish crime by brutalizing or blotting out the criminal, will restrain and make an honest effort to reform him, leaving vengeance to Him who hath said, "Vengeance is mine," and not adding crime to crime by taking away human life.

College Rowdyism

WHILE every excuse is made for the high spirits of young men, and older people rejoice as they observe the effervescent gaiety of youth, yet it remains an unanswered question why students in college may be permitted to behave like ruffians, while similar conduct on the part of young fellows in business would immediately be checked with a high hand by the municipal authorities. The immemorial conflict between town and gown has had a recent and somewhat startling illustration in the extravagant conduct of a few Yale freshmen at New Haven, of late. These young gentlemen so far forgot themselves, it is stated, as to insult peaceable passengers on the streets, throw pails of cold water from their windows on the heads of unoffending pedestrians, and dash firebrands into the midst of frightened crowds. Such deportment, fit rather for escaped lunatics than for the undergraduates of a dignified university, has been investigated by the faculty and, we are assured, will be rigorously punished. But will exclusion of the whole class from college athletics be quite fair to the large number of young men who had nothing to do with the outbreak? Why are not students at college individually amenable to law, the law of their city or State, precisely as other young men are? Why, for example, may Columbia students in, we will say, the Sophomore class, descend in wild foray on the class below them, take captive certain unfortunates, imprison them, gagged and bound, in a deserted warehouse, and then go on with their own merry-making, in gleeful triumph? This, till pounced upon by the astonished police, who released the prisoners.

Clerks, bookkeepers, salesmen of all sorts, would be held to strict account for folly of this sort which, if not criminal, approaches the border of crime. Probably tradition has more to do with this condition of affairs than most people think. It is not so much that the young men enjoy the scrimmage, the rush, the riot, and the hazing, as that an impression prevails that they are following out precedents set for them by students in times gone by. The remedy, if found at all, must be found within college walls and among the students themselves in an elevation of undergraduates' standards, and in a better public opinion in college precincts as to what students may or may not do.

Ideals in Business.

IT is a healthy sign when men of affairs begin to realize that material prosperity, to be firm and enduring, must be based upon sound ideals. Great businesses, that have been built up by honorable methods, carry with them a weight and influence that can never be attained by those that have risen through grasping and overriding, by sharp practice and the employment of means which, though within the law, are nevertheless crooked and knavish in the eyes of all right-thinking men. Let a man rise never so high, let him have the income and the imposing surroundings of a Crœsus, even though a thousand fawn upon him and ten thousand depend upon his favor for bread, if he has built up his fortunes at the sacrifice of his ideals, they will sooner or later crumble to a dustheap. Success that is not based upon high principle is rotten at the core.

As between character and coin, always place character first. That man of business who keeps his ideals well to the fore has a hearty contempt for chicane and for everything that savors of crookedness. He will have no part in financing schemes that are simply devised to cheat an unsuspicious public. Although he loves healthy competition, he won't jump in and take a mean advantage of his business rivals, for he despises underhand trickery. He would probably kick out of his office any one who came to suggest a deal that might yield him thousands at the lowering of his standard of action by just so much that it would cast a cloud upon a hitherto unblemished name. He won't lend his own nor his firm's influence or credit to "float" a swindle, however richly gilded it may be and however brilliant the promise of profit to himself. On every side he sees the buoys that warn him off the shallows, where others have come to wreck: the broker who fleeced his customers; the banker who was too free with the depositors' securities; the merchant who wooed trade with glittering lies and misrepresentation. They were very bold and skilful, and for a time rode on the crest of the wave, but they went under at last, victims to sacrificed ideals.

There are many things in which the honorable business man finds compensation for his fidelity to principle, but the greatest of these is the inward satisfaction which springs from a clear conscience. Come what may, having done his best, he can hold up his head before the world as an honest man who has wronged no one, stood by his colors, and lived up to his principles. And toward the end of life he will find that this real makes about all the difference.

The Peace Congress

HOPE of practical results from the approachi Peace Conference at the Hague is all the bright for the recent meeting of the Congress at Lucerne, sketch of which appears on another page. There always a danger of such conferences as that at t Hague becoming academic. It is so easy to deliver eloquent harangue on the horrors of war and the bles ings of peace, that the statesmen who will assemble the Hague may consider that their duty ends with th performance. In theory, of course, all statesmen ha war, and would avoid it if they could gain the en they seek by peaceful methods. It is wise, therefor that certain definite, concrete suggestions should prepared, by the real friends of peace, for their consi eration. This useful service the Congress at Lucer made it its business to perform.

Among these suggestions is that of the negotiation a permanent, obligatory arbitration treaty. The sixt delegates who were present from the United Stat were placed in a somewhat embarrassing position b this suggestion. The Senate of their own country ha rejected such a series of treaties after the late Joh Hay had succeeded in negotiating them. The value such treaties, however, could not be disputed in spite the action of the Senate. They contain the essence all movements in the direction of peace, inasmuch they provide for the submission to the Hague Tribun of all questions which do not affect the independenc integrity or vital interests of the two parties. It worthy of notice that in the separation of Norway an Sweden a more advanced step was taken. It was agree that the question whether the dispute did belong to th category, should itself be submitted to the Hague Tr bunal. That provision may come later, but it will be distinct advantage if the Powers could be induced t accept the treaties in their more contracted form.

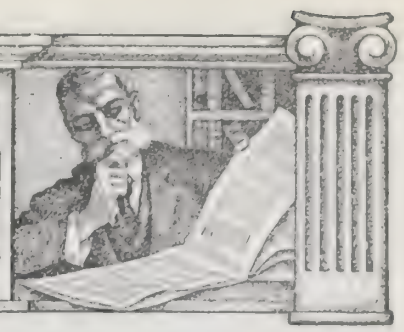
Another suggestion of the Lucerne Congress relate to the limitation of armaments; but this is less practic ble. If war became improbable, through the adoption a peaceful means of settling quarrels, the nations woul soon learn the uselessness of maintaining a huge arm which was never likely to be required, and might b safely left to adjust for themselves the extent of thei preparations for war. As a man living in an hones and law-abiding community, would not spend his mone in expensive locks, burglar alarms, and the support o savage watch dogs, the nations, satisfied of the amicabl disposition of their neighbors, would of their own accor reduce their armaments.

An interesting feature of the Congress was the mun ificence of several delegates, who contributed to th battleship fund started last year in Boston, and to th cost of maintaining the Peace museum, now inadequatel housed at Lucerne. The whole proceedings showe that the prevention of war is laying hold of publi opinion as a distinct possibility.

The Hall of Fame

ONE by one, good Americans who have passed on t that fair realm where beyond these voices there is peace, are having their names inscribed upon tablet in our Hall of Fame. No doubt, those who are writ ten there and those to whom the honor is refused, ar alike indifferent to our poor praise. But to us, wh still survive, it is rather a puzzle to understand why Edgar Allan Poe, the most original of American poets is denied a place among the famous? Why also Hor ace Greeley, whom all admit to have been a great statesman, is also turned down, and why up to this date, so magnificent an orator and clergyman as Phil lips Brooks has not received the requisite number o votes? We catch our breath with relief when we are told that both Lowell and Whittier have attained the great distinction. As for Noah Webster, his name at last accounts was trembling in the balance, but that doughty warrior, General W. T. Sherman, has forged ahead and will fill a niche with the great soldiers of the nation. It looks at the moment as if we ought to set up an opposition Hall of Fame.

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER



Canada's New Provinces.

ONE of the conspicuous evidences of the development of the Canadian Northwest is the elevation of several districts to the dignity and privileges of Provinces. The area comprised that vast region lying between British Columbia and Manitoba. It is now organized in the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The former comprises, in addition to the former district of Alberta, the western half of Athabasca and a narrow strip of Saskatchewan and of Assinboia. The new Province of Saskatchewan comprises the former territory of that name, with the eastern half of Athabasca and the greater part of Assinboia. The two Provinces have an aggregate area of 550,000 square miles and the population of each is estimated at a quarter of a million.

In each instance the day of inauguration was a day of celebration. The ceremony for Alberta was performed at Edmonton, the new capital, and that for Saskatchewan, three days afterwards, at Regina. Earl Grey, the Governor-General of Canada, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Premier, attended both ceremonies, and were enthusiastically welcomed by the citizens. There were processions of emblematic floats, of hundreds of school children and of public bodies, which were reviewed by the guests of honor and were congratulated on the new honors that had come to their home-land. A cable message from King Edward was read, in which His Majesty expressed earnest hopes for the prosperity of the newly organized Provinces. The swearing in of the new chiefs was duly performed. Hon. George H. V. Bulyea is the first Lieutenant-Governor of Alberta and Hon. A. E. Forget is the first Lieutenant-Governor of Saskatchewan.

It is reported that immigration to the Provinces, which was for many years extremely small, is now rapidly increasing, not only from Great Britain but from the United States and from the whole of northern Europe. The prospects of developing the coal mines, and the report that the region is rich in mineral wealth, combined with the favorable terms on which grants of land will be made for agricultural purposes, have attracted immigrants, who are now pouring in at an enormous rate. Men are quick to perceive and eager to gain such material advantages, though unhappily they frequently turn a deaf ear to the invitations which are urged upon them to become citizens of the heavenly kingdom in which they might have an everlasting possession.

To an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you (I. Peter 1: 4)

Horrors in Moscow

Rioting and bloodshed are holding high carnival in the ancient capital of the Russian Empire. Even in Russia, a day so shocking as Sunday, Oct. 8, has never been seen. Workmen on strike, peacefully parading the streets, with the hope of enlisting public sympathy, were attacked by Cossacks, who fired on the unarmed men and women, and then charged on the survivors with their sabres. After the crowd had been dispersed, the dead and wounded were dragged into the military stables, where the living were treated with horrible barbarity. A large number of men and boys, suspected of sympathizing with the strikers, were arrested and taken to the stables, where they were forced to run the gauntlet between a double row of soldiers, who were armed with heavy whips. Amid roars of laughter, the miserable prisoners were driven around the courtyard, and were lashed at every step. Few of them survived. Practically martial law prevails in the city, and innocent people arrested have no redress. The conduct of the police and the soldiers in seizing peaceful citizens without any charge, and imprisoning and flogging them, has exasperated the public. Reprisals are taking place. In one instance a man threw a bomb among a group of Cossacks, killing twelve of them, for which act dire vengeance was taken. Now as in olden times:

Oppression maketh a wise man mad (Eccles. 7: 7.)

His Body Bequeathed

A remarkable bequest appeared in the will of a distinguished civil engineer, who died recently in New York. He directed that his body should be given to the medical college nearest to the place where he might die, to be used in such manner as might best advance medical and surgical knowledge. After his death, his directions were carried out to the letter. The body was turned over to the University and Bellevue Medical School of New York and was dissected as directed. The will had been made seven years ago when the testator was in good health. For some time before his death he had been treated for several diseases. When the autopsy was performed, it was found that he had suffered from all the diseases for which he had been treated, but, in addition, there was one which had not been suspected, and it was from that he died. It was a withering of the organ called the pancreas, which, in the calf or lamb, is known as the sweetbread. The function of this organ is to aid in digestion. The surgeons said the condition of it in this case was unprecedented, and a chemical analysis would be necessary to discover the cause. So, perhaps, the testator's idea that his body might advance medical knowledge will be fulfilled even better than he expected. There are few persons who would have made such a bequest. Most people shrink from the thought of their bodies being mutilated after death, but with him the desire to serve humanity was evidently superior to sentimental considerations. That desire is manifested in many ways, but none have ever reached that sublime form that His took, who, though the Son of the Highest, voluntarily lived and suffered as a man, and actually laid down his life that the world might be saved.

Who gave himself a ransom for all (I. Timothy 2: 6).

Menaced by Vesuvius

Reports of the activity of Vesuvius are again received. It is stated that a huge cone, which confined the lava on one side, has crumbled away under the terrific heat and has fallen into the crater. A heavy cloud hangs over the mountain, illumined at night by the reflection of the molten lava. There are frequent explosions in the interior of the volcano, which are followed by the eruption of stones and ashes which rise to an immense height. Meanwhile the lava flows down the sides of the mountain in a steady stream, greater in volume than any in recent times. It is believed that the eruption has some physical connection with the recent earthquake in Calabria, which, it is now stated, destroyed over three hundred villages. There is great alarm among the people who live in the district, for the shocks continue, although their force is diminished. It is much to be wished that these alarming phenomena might lead the people to seek after God:

Who removeth the mountains; who shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble (Job 9: 5, 6)

An Outcast

A man is now on shipboard who finds it difficult to land in any country. He is an Italian who was rejected from New York by the Immigration Commissioners. He then went to Havana, but was not permitted to land. Thence he took a ship for Colombia, but there too there was a like objection to receiving him. Returning to Cuba, he tried to secure an entrance at Santiago, but the Commissioners at that port were more vigilant than he expected, and he was sent back on board ship. It is reported that he has gone to Jamaica, but it is little likely that the British authorities will receive him. The trouble is that he has a bad record, which made his own country an unsafe place for him. Probably he imagined that it would be easy to make a new home in another land, but, refused admission everywhere, it seems as if he might have to spend the remainder of his life at sea. No nation has any desire for an immigrant of bad character, who would be apt to make trouble. Such an experience might drive a man to despair. It would be well if in his wanderings he met some one who could tell him of One who receives the worst sinners if they come to him as penitents.

Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out (John 6: 37

Should we Abolish Capital Punishment?

Representative Americans---Lawyers and Jurists, Governors, Congressmen, Churchmen, Authors and Economists, Discuss the Difficult Problem

SHOULD we abolish capital punishment, or should we continue to inflict the death penalty?

This question in its two forms—one of the most difficult to solve of the broad economic problems of to-day—was submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a number of representative Americans in many fields of high endeavor. In the majority of the answers received and given herewith, the writers are emphatically of the opinion that the death penalty should be abolished. Of all who answered, only one in each three declares the belief that the law relating to punishment of murderers should remain as it is.

There is, however, much difference of opinion among thinkers, as to the effect of the abolition of the death penalty. Many deny the right of any government so to punish, maintaining besides that it is less efficacious than life imprisonment.

Would the removal of the death penalty increase the number of homicides? Does fear of the extreme punishment deter the murderer? Of the 90,000 prisoners now in our prisons, nearly 9,000 are charged with murder. There were 128 more executions in 1904 than in 1901. There is a greater percentage of murders in States having the death penalty (New York and Pennsylvania, for example) than in States that have abolished such penalty (Wisconsin and Maine). Does capital punishment, then, really achieve its purposes as a deterrent of crime?

Is the death penalty civilized or barbarian? Some declare that electrocution, particularly, is not only repulsive and inhuman but also barbarous and, in a Christian land, disgraceful. Against capital punishment arguments are often urged from Scripture. Does the death penalty break the commandment: "Thou shalt not kill?" Moses prescribed "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life." Can this be construed as a biblical justification of the death penalty? "The Lord giveth"—is man justified in "taking away?" In regard to women—convicted of murder—many thinkers argue that capital punishment should be abolished, at least so far as women are concerned. Should women be exempt from the death penalty, and why?

These were the questions submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. All the State governors who answered oppose the abolition of capital punishment. Of four congressmen, three are for abolition of the death penalty. Of six lawyers and judges, three are against abolition, two are for total and immediate abolition, and one is in doubt. A United States Senator, the Mayor of Chicago, the Bishop of Salt Lake, the Chaplain of the House of Representatives, and nearly all the writers on economics, favor substituting life imprisonment for the extreme penalty.

Among those who sent replies to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S invitation to give their views on this subject are the following:

Governor Hoch, Kansas; Governor Beckham, Kentucky; Governor Elrod, South Dakota; United States Senator Gallinger, New Hampshire; Congressmen Brown and Jenkins, Wisconsin; Congressman Bowersock, Kansas; Congressman Sherley, Kentucky; Judge Van Hoesen, New York; Mayor Dunne, Chicago; Ellis H. Roberts, Treasurer of the United States; Francis E. Leupp, Committee of Indian Affairs; Bishop Spalding, Utah; General Rochester, United States Army; Henry N. Couden, Chaplain of the House of Representatives; Henry B. F. McFarland, President of Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia; Eugene Smith, President of the New York Prison Association; Dr. E. M. Gallaudet, Washington; J. H. McFarland, President American Civic Association; Walter S. Logan, Asa Bird Gardiner and Bolton Hall, lawyers; Ernest Thompson Seton, Edward Payson Jackson. Will N. Capital Punishment Not a Deterrent

BY HON. E. W. HOCH, Governor of Kansas

The whole trend of thought on the subject of criminology is and has ever been toward more humane penalties. Indeed, the march of civilization is well marked in the world's penal statutes. Time was when punishments were purposely made as severe and brutal as possible. Criminals were boiled in oil, stretched upon iron racks, inclosed in barrels with spikes protruding inward and rolled down steep declivities, and tortured in every conceivable way. But we have gradually grown away from these brutal practices in the name of the law, and capital punishment is the worst, if not the only remaining relic of the dark ages in the treatment of crime. The infliction of this punishment has been made as humane as possible, which is a prophecy of its ultimate abandonment.

Capital punishment does not deter criminals from committing crime. Statistics abundantly establish this fact. It is a brutal custom that does no good, and must soon give way to a better philosophy of government and a higher Christian civilization.

Topeka, Kan. E. W. HOCH.

Death Penalty Does Not Violate Scripture

BY HON. S. H. ELROD, Governor of South Dakota

If capital punishment should be abolished, it would increase murders. In my mind, there is no doubt that the effect of this extreme punishment deters the murderer. To compare New York and Pennsylvania with Wisconsin and Maine is unfair. The conditions in the States named are entirely different. If a man or a woman is proven guilty, beyond a reasonable doubt, of having taken the life of another, and the statute provides for capital punishment, it is neither barbarous nor disgraceful to hang. I think that the death penalty does not violate the Commandment, "Thou shalt not kill" "The Lord giveth" and man can "Taketh away." Might can make right. I would be in favor of abolishing capital punishment if it would benefit mankind and lessen the percentage of murders. S. H. ELROD.

Women's Executions are Abhorrent

BY HON. EDWARD F. DUNNE, Lawyer and Jurist; Mayor of Chicago

I am in favor of legislation abolishing the death penalty. I am not satisfied that it is a deterrent which will prevent the commission of murder. The crime of murder seems to be perpetrated with as much frequency in States where there is a death penalty as in States where there is no death penalty. The lawful taking away of the life of a woman is particularly abhorrent to me. I am glad to be able to say that during the thirteen years I sat upon the bench I never found it necessary to inflict the death penalty. The tendency to restrict the death penalty to extreme cases of deliberate and atrocious murder in our civilized countries is plainly apparent. In the twentieth century the legal taking away of human life ought to be abolished. E. F. DUNNE.

All Ages Have Favored the Death Penalty

BY JUDGE GEORGE M. VAN HOESEN

I regard any plan to make death the penalty for murder where the murderer is a man, but imprisonment where the murderer is a woman, as the production of a mind governed not by reason but by morbid sentimentalism. In my judgment, there is no sense in making sex the scale by which punishment for crime is to be measured. If a woman poisons her husband, why, in the name of reason, does she not deserve the same punishment as the man who poisons his wife? Do the Scriptures teach us that the Almighty makes a distinction between male and female sinners, and lets up on the woman?

Certainly, if God does not make the punishment of sinners depend upon sex, man has no right, or at least no reason to do so. Is it not the height of folly to invest the cold blooded murderess with a halo that shall protect her from the enforcement of the divine decree, that whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed? Why should the law spare the female criminal? Justice may be tempered with mercy, and with regard to the frailties of human nature, but where there are no extenuating circumstances, the murderer, whether male or female, should suffer the punishment that the wisdom of the world in all ages has inflicted on the shedder of man's blood. The World Not Ready for its Abolition

BY HON. ASA BIRD GARDINER, A.M. LL.D., L.H.D.

During my public service, which included several years as District-Attorney of New York County, and over twenty-five years as an acting Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, or as a Judge Advocate in the prosecution of crime, I had abundant opportunity to consider this question. We have too much mawkish sentimentality in this country of the kind that sends flowers to a convicted murderer, and hails with acclaim and offers of marriage or of employment, women of notoriously bad characters, who have barely escaped the death sentence, not by acquittal, but by a disagreeing jury. Among these people the fact seems to be wholly lost sight of or unknown as to the object of punishment prescribed by law. Under our system of government, it is not for the purpose of inflicting humiliation or deprivation of life or liberty on the individual, but in order to deter others from committing the like offences. There is many a man of low and brutal instincts and temper who, in rage or hatred of another, would take life were he not deterred by the thought that his own would be the penalty.

You remark that there were more executions for murder in 1904 than there were in 1901, and this is to be expected in this country where population has been increasing so enormously. You add that there is a greater percentage of murders in States having the death penalty (New York and Pennsylvania for example) than in States that have abolished such penalty (Wisconsin and Maine), and you ask if, therefore, capital punishment achieves its purpose. The comparison is not an equal one; on the contrary the people of Wisconsin are largely from a superior class of emigrants and the people of Maine are quite homogeneous as descendants of original settlers. On the other hand, into the States of New York and Pennsylvania have come the criminal classes of Europe on secret tickets-of-leave and passage paid, for the last eighty or ninety years.

Several years ago I had to represent the United States in a murder case in the State of Maine where capital punishment had been abolished, so far as the State jurisdiction was concerned, but still existed as to forts and other territory of the United States in that State, and I heard much unfavorable comment on the law of the State abolishing capital punishment. If capital punishment does not always subserve its urpose of deterring others from committing a like offence, it is because the trials re so loosely conducted by prosecuting fficers that, in very many cases, reversals llow where the crime is apparently clear.

As before remarked, the whole object of w-givers for centuries in Christian counies as to punishment of crime has been to eter others from committing like offences. ou quote Moses' declaration of "an eye r an eye.' etc., and the commandment Thou shalt not kill," and for an answer will say, I think it will be doubtful to nd anywhere in history greater wisdom han in Moses as a law-giver. The comandment "Thou shalt not kill" did not ean that the man who did kill wantonly ould not be adequately punished for such ffence. If it were otherwise, society would e at the mercy of criminals. As to the quiry "The Lord giveth, can man taketh way?" I give you the same answer, if he Lord giveth life no man should wanonly take it away, but if he does, until we each the millennium, he must be punished r it, in order to protect society and not t him work his will upon the community espite the Biblical injunction. I see no istinction which can properly be made in he case of a woman who deliberately ommits murder and in the case of a man.

Puts Us on the Murderer's Level

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, Author of House and Hearth, etc., etc.

I do not believe the removal of the death enalty would increase murder. Those who nurder expect either to evade punishment, r lose all thought of it in the perpetrating f the act. Capital punishment is the most evolting feature of our civilization. It is relic of barbarism. We cannot logically riticise those who once burned culprits at he stake, or bound them to the hoofs of orses, and drove the horses in different irections till their victims were torn in ieces, so long as we hang and electrocute ersons. Because a man is brutal and deraded enough to murder, gives us no reaon for brutalizing and degrading ourselves o his level, and because he is a murderer, ecome murderers ourselves. He is one nurderer; but when we execute him, we ecome a community of murderers.

Of course, if it is savage and unwise to ang a man, it is savage and unwise to hang woman. But until a woman has a voice n making the laws, it is tyrannical to subect her to their extreme penalty. We ave no right to take life. It is not ours. We cannot restore it. All that we have a ight to do is to protect society. And that is done by reformatory and self-supporting imprisonment, with no pardoning power, and with no reversion of sentence except, by the discovery of sufficient evidence to justify a new trial.

The Old Law of Retaliation Obsolete

BY SILAS SWALLOW, Editor of The Church Forum

Many years ago, Horace Greeley wrote in his own inimitable way, "The worst possible use to which you can put a man, is to hang him." We are in hearty sympathy, and have been for many years, with Mr. Greeley's views on capital punishment, and among others for the following reasons:

First. The law of Christ looks to restoration, redemption, and restitution. All tending to render the old law of retaliation obsolete.

Second. Fear of the death penalty does not seem to lessen the number of homicides, since there are proportionately more murders in States where capital punishment prevails, than in those States where it has been abolished.

Third. The natural abhorrence to taking human life, so frequently prevents the conviction of murderers in a degree that would forfeit the life of the accused, that imprisonment and a useful occupation would insure a much larger number of convictions.

Belva A. Lockwood

Sarah K. Bolton

Fourth. Destroying the life of the murderer prevents him from restoring, by the fruits of his labor, to the extent of his ability, that service to the family and friends of the murdered one, of which by his murder he had deprived them.

Fifth. A large percentage of homicides in this, and in every country, are the direct product of the legalized liquor business, and a government that for profit, licenses one set of men to sell a substance that always hurts and never helps another set of men, rendering them crazy up to the point of committing murder, is itself a criminal government; and, if it were possible, should itself share in whatever punishment it metes out to its ill-fated victims. To render men murderers by law, and then murder them for murdering, is inhuman, and worse than heathenish. It is barbarous, devilish.

No Christian Can Defend It

BY ELLA HIGGINSON, Author and Magazine Writer

I have always considered capital punishment uncivilized and barbarous. A person who believes in it is not a Christian. I favor a life imprisonment at hard work—which gives a criminal a chance to atone for his crime. It also makes it possible for a prisoner's innocence to be proven if he has been wrongly convicted. While we uphold capital punishment, we are brothers in spirit to the savage mobs that burn men at the stake. ELLA HIGGINSON.

No Moral Right to Take Life

BY MRS. BELVA A. LOCKWOOD

What moral right has a State to take life? Can the State do morally what the individual cannot? or, in other words, can it, and should it take the life of a criminal because the criminal has taken the life of a fellow? Is a crime lessened because it is done by a collective body rather than by an individual? I hold that neither the State or the individual has a right to take a human life, something that it cannot give. If the convicted man is shown to be innocent, after he has been hung there is no reparation, and the State stands in this case, itself convicted of murder. If it is a life sentence, and innocence is proven, the convicted man may go free.

Capital punishment is a relic of barbarism, like waging war instead of arbitration, to settle national difficulties,—imprisonment for debt, branding, cutting off an ear, or walking over red hot irons, etc., and should be at once abolished by all civilized nations. In regard to women convicted of murder, although they are the mothers of the race, I am not prepared to say that they should be treated with any more leniency than men. Their education and surroundings in this age of the world are very similar to those of men. Why should they be exempt from the responsibility and from the punishment of crime? I hardly think that sex should be an extenuating plea. They are governed by the same laws, educated in the same schools, nurtured in the same homes, and have similiar opportunities for self-advancement. They must be punished in a rational way for crime, if society is to be protected, but not by capital punishment. The human mind in this age revolts at such a spectacle. There is a better way. The ostracism of society itself after conviction, would in most cases render incarceration for a time desirable. Abolish every system of law by which a man or set of men can legally take the life of a brother man.

It is Contrary to Christianity

BY HON. HENRY N. COUDEN, Chaplain House of Representatives

I have been for many years opposed to capital punishment. First, because it is contrary, in my judgment, to both the letter and the spirit of the Christian religion. Second, it does not prevent murder, but rather increases the crime, since its effect on the community at large is and must be demoralizing. Third, it is a relic of barbarism and therefore beneath the dignity of the civilization of our day. Fourth, there is a better way, which not only protects against the evil, but affords opportunity for the reformation of the criminal, namely, life imprisonment.

Would Mob Law Follow Abolition?

BY SENATOR A. J. MCLAURIN, of Mississippi

Punishment by human tribunals is to deter the commission of, not to avenge, crimes. Some crimes can be prevented by capital punishment only. It is useless to name them. They will occur to you upon reflection.

Capital punishment by law, if abolished, would be replaced by the mob. Take your choice. A. J. MCLAURIN.

He Would Broaden the Death Penalty

BY CONGRESSMAN J. D. BOWERSOCK, of Kan.

"Should we abolish capital punishment?" I say emphatically No. No figures are needed to show that a vast majority of human beings perfer to live and not to die. When we find an exception to this rule, there is little difficulty in convincing a jury that the party without regard for his life is non compos mentis. The desire to live is a part of us. Most murders are committed by the lower and more debased and ignorant class—a class that has had comparatively little to endear them to freedom of right action—and the idea that to this class there is restraint in simply depriving them of the privilege of going where they can and confining them in better quarters, with more comfortable clothes and better food and a care that they have never before been accustomed to, with a prospect of pardon by some official whose sympathies are stronger than his common sense, is to me absurd. I would broaden the death penalty rather than restrict it.

Lawrence, Kan J. D. BOWERSOCK.

It Restrains Criminals Slightly, If at All

BY EUGENE SMITH, President New York Prison Association

The deterrent influence of capital punishment is the strongest argument urged in support of the death penalty. The deterrent value of legal penalties of every kind, however, is estimated much lower now than in former times. Some authorities have even gone so far as to deny that the fear of punishment exerts any appreciable effect in diminishing the volume of crime. That hardened and confirmed criminals are slightly, if at all, restrained from crime by the terrors of the law seems to be now quite firmly established.

Many reasons bearing great weight have been presented by those who advocate the abolition of capital punishment in support of their contention; but even the most summary exposition of the arguments advanced would demand the space of an extended treatise. One of the most candid and fruitful discussions of the question in all its phases that has come under my notice, is found in the Introduction to his Criminal Code for Louisiana, by Edward Livingston. This proves, by the way, that the question was a burning one nearly a hundred years ago. Its final solution will doubtless be reached through experience, and by comparison of the actual results where capital punishment is enforced, with those which obtained where it has been abolished.

A Woman's Plea for Women

BY MRS. LILLIE DEVEREAUX BLAKE, President National Legislative League

It is quite time that all civilized nations abolished the death penalty. Facts prove that the decrease in crime has kept pace with the lesson of severity of punishment. When hanging was the sentence, even for small robberies, there was, relatively, as much theft as there is to-day, when imprisonment has been substituted. In the States where there are no executions there are no more murders, pro rata than in the States where the horrors of hanging or electrocution still prevail.

U. S. Senator Gallinger

If it is cruel and unwise to inflict the death penalty on a man, it is not only cruel, but unjust to deprive a woman of her life, whatever she may have done. Women are denied all voice in making the laws, except in the four free States, where they have equal political rights with men. In all the other commonwealths, they are classed with minors, idiots and lunatics. The extreme penalty of the law is rarely inflicted on minors, never on lunatics or idiots. By what rule of justice can it be inflicted on their political compeers, women? We are either grown up, intelligent beings, capable of understanding the difference between right and wrong, able to comprehend the laws, to take part in their framing, and to be held responsible for their violation,

Hit, Where the Ark was Built*

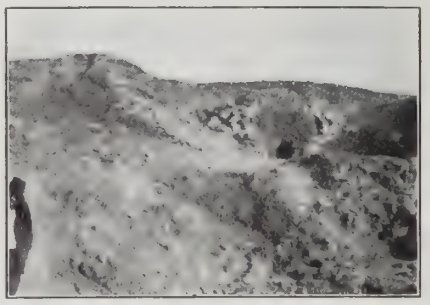
BY PROF. EDGAR JAMES BANKS

THE route across the Arabian desert, from Babylonia to Palestine—the route followed 6,000 years ago by the great Sargon, by Abraham, by the armies of Assyria and Egypt, by the ten captive Hebrew tribes from Samaria, by the captives from Jerusalem, by the returning exiles under the leadership of Ezra, by the armies of Rome and of the Bagdad califs, and by the modern explorer—is still the same. If, at the western part of the long journey, the course differed, still every traveler passed the city of Hit, on the Euphrates, in northern Babylonia. It is at Hit that the modern Arab postman leaves the valley, and upon his fleet dromedary strikes across the great waterless desert to Damascus, ten days away. The loaded caravăn goes further north by a longer and easier route.

The city of Hit is of interest to the Bible student. There Ezra collected the Babylonian exiles, and remained three days before starting on the long return journey across the desert. There also are the springs of pitch which have made the city famous in Oriental history for at least 6,000 years. Ezra (8: 15) says, "I gathered them (the exiles) together to the river that runneth to Ahava, and there abode we in tents three days." The name of the city has been legion, for every nation seems to have called it by a different one. The ancient inscriptions spoke of it as Ihi of the bitumen. The Egyptians in the inscription at Karnak, called it Ist. Ezra, who gave Hebrew pronunciation, called it Ahava. Herodotus shortened the Egyptian to Is; the later Greeks spoke of it as Æiopolis, and the Arabs of the time of the Califs, sensitive to the odor of the pitchy springs, the smoke of the lime-kilns, the hot salt springs, the constant din of the ship-building yards, and the clatter of the great water-wheels, turned by the current of the river, appropriately called it the "Mouth of Hell." Its modern name, Hit, is a corruption of some of its earlier names.

The city, consisting of a few hundred low, flat stone houses, is perched upon an artificial mound overlooking the Euphrates. The streets are narrow and filthy, the shops contain but a miserable supply of native goods; the people resemble the Arabs of most towns; yet the women of Hit are noted throughout the desert for their beauty. Beneath the town, the Arabs, while digging for building stones, find Kufic, Byzantine, and Parthian coins, and at a greater depth, Babylonian statuettes. Excavations there might result in the discovery of objects of considerable value.

Behind the city are a number of bitumen springs, to which the existence of the place is mainly due. Two of the springs are but a few yards apart; one sends up a stream of cold water, the other is hot. From them both there ooze from the ground great, flabby chunks of coal-black bitumen. In several of the salt streams near the village, the bitumen, coming up through the ground, appears upon the surface; sooner or later, as it floats along, it becomes entangled upon the sides of the stream and forms a bridge beneath which the water passes. The seams of the gypsum rocks of the neighborhood are filled with the bitumen, which has worked itself up from below. Springs of naphtha and petroleum in the vicinity give evidence of an extensive deposit of oil beneath the place.



A Bitumen Spring at Hit

The bitumen springs have always been the life of the town. God said to Noah: "Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch" (Gen. 6:14). The pitch referred to in the passage was undoubtedly the bitumen of Hit. If one were to venture to guess where the ark was made, "Hit" would certainly be the answer. Because of the bitumen, the city has always been the centre of the ship-building industry of Babylonia. There to-day the round, wicker "coracles" —the river boat of Mesopotamia — are woven and smeared "within and without with pitch," and the long reed canoes and the larger merchant boats are covered with it. Still more interesting is the large, square-cornered boat, peculiar to Hit. Like Noah's ark, it is not only smeared with pitch; it is provided at the stern with three stories, and with rooms with windows and doors. It has been remarked more than once that the Arabs of Hit are still building arks.

The bitumen of the springs was an article of commerce as early as 4,500 B. C. The ivory eye-sockets of a marble head, found at Bismya, were held in place by means of bitumen. The terra cotta cistern of an early Babylonian cracked, and the crack was stopped up with bitumen. The head of a statuette, which was broken off, was mended with bitumen. The drains of that period were lined with it; the bricks of the temple were laid in it as in cement; Mugheir, the modern name of Ur of the Chaldees, the early home of Abraham, is derived from the bitumen between the bricks of its temple. In ancient times, large quantities of it was sold in Egypt.

It is only since the Turk has misruled the country that the springs have become insignificant. The largest of them is now owned by the Turkish Government, which leases it for 80 cents a day.

From the springs, which seem to be public property, the pitch is collected and used for fuel, or it is boiled to make it firmer. In the latter case it is shaped into plates, or smeared over the wicker baskets to render them water-tight, or formed into knobs upon the ends of wooden sticks, and used by the Arabs as weapons; or it is sold to the shipbuilders, or employed for the roofing of houses. During the frequent cholera epidemics which ravage Babylonia, the disease never enters Hit. The pitch, which is said to beautify its women, is also supposed to protect them from malady.

Such is the town by which Ezra and the returning exiles encamped for three days. Undoubtedly they, like every passing voyager of the present time, visited the springs, and with their own hands collected enough of the black pitch to furnish a knob for their clubs that would protect them during their desert journey. The Ahava of Ezra differed little from the Hit of to-day.

No Man Beyond Hope of Reformation

BY THE RIGHT REV. F. S. SPALDING, D.D., Bishop of Salt Lake

I am afraid my personal feelings make me incapable of passing a candid judgment upon the subject of capital punishment. I had once to minister to a man on the scaffold, and the whole proceeding was so horrible that I am unalterably opposed to it. It seems to me unchristian to suppose that any man is beyond hope of reformation.

Life Imprisonment at Hard Labor is Better

BY CONGRESSMAN JOHN J. JENKINS, of Wisconsin

After considerable experience as a prosecuting official, and in several cases where death was the penalty, I unhesitatingly say capital punishment should be abolished. It does not deter crime, and it is brutal. Life imprisonment at hard labor is, in all respects, better. JOHN J. JENKINS, M. C.

An Inhuman and Uncivilized Penalty

BY CONGRESSMAN W. E. BROWN, of Wisconsin

I am thoroughly opposed to capital punishment, and think it should be abolished in all States. It is an inhuman and uncivilized penalty, and, in my opinion, does not deter the murderer from committing the act, to any greater extent than does life imprisonment, as is proven by the fact that there is a greater percentage of murders in States where the death penalty is in force, than in those where the penalty is life imprisonment. W. E. BROWN.

In addition to the foregoing, a large number of letters have been received, from which we can only quote briefly. Will N. Harben, the famous Southern author, writes: "Public sentiment has grown so strong against capital punishment that it is now ten times as difficult and expensive as formerly to convict a man guilty of murder, and also the cause of many criminals being released with no punishment at all. Moreover, innocent individuals have been occasionally executed, and this is too great a responsibility for twelve well-meaning men to take upon their shoulders." Edwin D. Mead, of the International Peace Congress, writes: "The continuance of capital punishment degrades and hardens every community which sanctions it." Edward Payson Jackson, author, writes: "If there are other means of protection equally or more efficient, then capital punishment is nothing less than judicial murder." Bolton Hall, lawyer and economist, writes: "Capital punishment remains long after anybody believes in it." Hon. J. Horace McFarland, President American Civic Association, writes: "If the fear of capital punishment were removed, murders would increase." Dr. E. M. Gallaudet, President, Columbia College Deaf and Dumb Institute, writes favoring radical reforms in the present methods of executions, rather than abolition. Congressman Swager Sherley of Kentucky, writes: "I am inclined to believe it should be abolished." Hon. Ellis H. Roberts, Treasurer of the United States, writes: "Unless the law is armed with the power of death, it lacks the force and the majesty upon which, in the last resort, government, society, the home and the safety of the individual must depend." Sarah K. Bolton, author, writes: "We are living under a Christian dispensation, and need reformation rather than death." Hon. Francis E. Leupp, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, writes: "The question of capital punishment, like that of war, will settle itself in the orderly course of our evolution . . . Shedding one's neighbor's blood will not cease till the spirit which impels it is educated out of the moral nature of man It cannot be hanged out." U. S. Senator Jacob H. Gallinger of New Hampshire, writes strongly in favor of the abolition of the death penalty. He writes: "Does capital punishment achieve its purpose? No! Is it civilized? No! Is it Christian? No! 'The Lord giveth'—can man 'taketh away?' Not in justice." Walter S. Logan, lawyer and economist, thinks, "If it is necessary to protect society, to kill the people who disregard society's primary laws, they must be killed." Dr. Anita Newcomb McGee also writes against abolition.

The Story of Strang, the "Mormon King"

N a book recently published, entitled A Child of the Sea, or Life Among e Mormons, the author, Mrs. Eliza- th Whitney Williams, devotes several apters to the strange life and tragic ath of James Jesse Strang the self-styled Mormon King." The author says, "To any who may read these pages, it may em like a fairy tale, to know that a king- m ever existed within the borders of the nited States. A kingdom has existed, and at little kingdom was on Beaver Island, w commonly known as St. James, being med in honor of him ho called himself a king.

"James Jesse Strang as born in and educat- l in New York State, udied law and became a ccessful practioner. For ght years he ruled on eaver Island, and dur- g that time was twice ected to the State Leg- lature of Michigan. 'ith winning manners d eloquent address, he as considered one of the ost brilliant men of the ty. Strang, at the time f Joseph Smith's death, as living in Wisconsin, nd having previously oined the Mormon hurch, he claimed to ave a "revelation," hat he was chosen to fill oseph Smith's place. Ie made strenuous truggles for leader- hip, but only to be disappointed, as Brigham Young was chosen as successor to mith.

James Jesse Strang

A few of Strang's followers had entire elief in him, and followed him in his etirement to Kirtland, O., where a Mor- on Temple was built. Large numbers of he Mormons went with Young to Salt ake City. Strang, feeling his defeat eenly and growing restless, determined to o where he could have more liberty and ower. He cast about for a place where e could establish a kingdom, where his way would be complete. The would-be ruler was wise enough to know that he must find some secluded spot in which to carry on his plans, where the law of the land could not easily reach him, and this he found on Beaver Island. On first beholding it, he said he thought it must be the most beautiful place upon earth. "This is where I will build up my kingdom," said he. The author continues:

"Strang's wife was not a believer in the Mormon doctrine, having no faith in the revelations he claimed; but Strang had a great command of language and possessed strong will power. He, at last, persuaded a few of his followers to come with him to Beaver Island, where they landed from a steamer in the early part of June, 1848. About twenty-five people came with him, and before navigation closed, over a hundred had landed, most of them all unprepared for the long, cold winter on an island where snows were extremely deep in winter. The whole surrounding country was a wilderness, and white settlers were few in number. There were many different tribes of Indians wandering about, hunting and fishing." Strang's people were afraid of the Indians, but as they proved friendly, the Mormons were soon reassured.

Mrs. Williams was at this time a little girl, and saw a good deal of this strange man, who proclaimed himself king. "When mother spoke to them" (the Mormons, says the author), "they told her, that King Strang had all these revelations from God, and that he, being their leader, they must obey what he said."

When winter, with its cold and suffering came, the King took the last boat away from the Island, leaving his subjects to fare as best they could. They suffered much from hunger, and some of them would have starved, but for the kindness of the Gentiles, but still the poor deluded people were loyal to their "King." When spring returned, it brought the man back, calm and serene; their sufferings had never disturbed him. When told of the hardships of his people, he laughed and said, "Oh, they must get used to island life, and expect to have some hardships."

From time to time other Mormons joined the colony, bringing horses and cows with them. The King now began to have new "revelations," one being that it was right for his people to take whatever was necessary for them to have. After this, no Gentile property was secure. Cattle were taken and butchered. A Mormon who gave information concerning these stealings was whipped unmercifully. He swore revenge, but bided his time.

At first Strang preached against polygamy; but it was not long before he had another "revelation," that his people must practice this revolting custom. His wife left him at this time, taking her three children with her.

"The King now took one of his young wives, had her dress in man's apparel and travel about with him, seeking more converts. The name he gave her was 'Charles Douglas.' He made a great joke of this, and boasted that 'Charles' was the best worker he ever had. If Strang was magnetic 'Charles' was irresistible. She was a beautiful woman."

Strang added more wives to his family, saying that he must enlarge his house to accommodate them, and also started a school for his children. The King levied a tax upon the proceeds of his subjects' industry. One man refused, and his life was the forfeit. He was shot down when returning to his home from work. The writer continues:

"Not long after Bennett's death, I saw the King coming to our house. The very name of Strang struck terror to my heart. . . . I said to mother 'Where shall I go? I am so afraid of Strang.' The little girl ran and hid under her mother's bed, but Strang, seeing her feet sticking out, called to her, saying 'Come out child, I will not hurt you. Come and sit on my lap.' Mother said, 'the child is afraid of you ever since you had Bennett killed.' I drew back, he pulled me out by the hand taking me in his arms, and sitting in the chair, he stroked my hair saying, 'I will not hurt you, child.' His voice was low and his face was sad. I looked at him a long time, and then I said, 'I see blood on your head.' He put his hand to his head, passing it over his forehead, and looking at his hand, he said, 'I see no blood.' He was very pale and nervous. Mother explained to him that I had heard the people say that the blood of Bennett was resting on Strang's head."

Strang began to carry things with such a high hand, and there were so many scenes of violence, robbery and bloodshed, that finally the fishermen and merchants made a strong appeal to the government asking for protection. The United States steamer Michigan, was sent with officers to make an investigation. On landing at Beaver Island, Strang was sent for by the officers, who wished to consult him. On the way to the steamer Strang was shot by two men who stepped from behind a wood pile. The shots were fatal, but Strang lingered eleven days in great agony. When he knew he must die, the "King" forgot all his numerous wives, and begged to be taken to Mary, his first wife, saying "Take me home to Mary, my true wife. I cannot die here. I want to die with my wife and children. Take me to Mary; I know she will forgive me." And she did, and this strange and terrible man, died in the arms of the wife he had so deeply wronged.

The two men who shot Strang did so in revenge for their own wrongs. One was Bedford, the man who was whipped, and the other's heart was filled with bitterness for the cruel treatment he had suffered from the "King." They gave themselves up, but were never punished for their deed. The door of the jail was opened one night, and they were told to hurry to the dock and go on board a steamer. Public sentiment was so roused against the Mormons that it would have been impossible to have found a jury who would have convicted these men.

A NOVEL TEMPERANCE CRUSADE

OBSERVANT passers-by at the corner of Twenty-second and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia, any Wednesday afternoon at half-past four o'clock, might notice something of interest going on. Scores of children are making their way from all directions towards the chapel of Holy Trinity Memorial Church. Should the onlooker detain one of these children to ask what the attraction is, he will at once receive the prompt reply, "It's our Temperance School. We have it every Wednesday."

In the upper story of the chapel, in the spacious Sunday School room, are circle after circle of classes of children from five to fifteen years of age. A stout, bright-faced woman, alert and cordial, moves up and down the aisles greeting each arrival. She assigns the new scholars to places on the benches. Many of the children leave to go to work at an early age and their places in the school are at once taken by the new arrivals.

For nearly twenty years, since 1888, this class has been in existence, teaching the children lessons of Gospel temperance. The school now numbers nearly six hundred children and thirty-two teachers. It represents the consecrated zeal of a society of Christian temperance young women, under the leadership of Misses H. L. Lee and M. J. Burk.

The children are taught a new catechism in the temperance school. Scripture and the music are the chief features of the exercises. It is like a Sunday School, yet very different. The catechism has questions and answers like this:

Q. What are the bones for?
A. To keep the body in shape.
Q. How do they grow?
A. By what we eat.
Q. Will alcohol make them grow?
A. It will not.
Q. What will make the muscles strong?
A. Exercise, as swimming, walking, rowing.
Q. Will alcohol strengthen the muscles?
A. No: it will weaken them by loading them with fat.
Q. Will the nerves telegraph pain for the man who is drunk?
A. No: because the nerves are out of order and cannot carry messages.
Q. Will alcohol cure pain?
A. No: it only stops the nerves from reporting it.
Q. What is necessary to make alcohol?
A. Water, air, sugar, the right degree of heat and ferment.
Q. From what are the juices obtained?

The Temperance School in Session

A. Apples, berries, grapes, etc.
Q. Who made the fruits?
A. God.
Q. Did God make the alcohol in them?
A. He did not.
Q. How, then, do men get it from them?
A. Only by letting the juice stand and rot.
Q. Will alcohol ever make the body strong?
A. Never.

After the recitations from this significant catechism, stirring temperance songs and hymns are sung, like, "Onward, Christian Soldiers" and "Forward, we are marching, alcohol to fight." A Bible verse is taught the entire school by the leader, among the favorites being, "Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall," "Keep thy tongue from evil and thy lips from speaking guile." Then the national motto is recited, "Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up!" And the State motto and the pledge quickly follow, uttered by five hundred young voices, "Touch not, taste not, handle not." There is a brief talk by the brisk, energetic leader, who perhaps explains how the Crusaders started out to capture the Holy City for the Lord, and urges the children of the temperance school to start out to capture their city temperance.

Each child, after the hour's varied exercises, is given a little temperance leaflet to take home and pass on to some one. There is no collection. An award is given for bringing in new scholars. The two great events in the temperance school year are the parents' annual reception, when the children bring their relatives, and the annual entertainment in June, usually an out-of-doors festivity. A Moroccan Fairyland

Tangier, as seen from the sea, might be a vision of fairyland. Once inside the walls, you find yourself in a mere conglomeration of crooked lanes, shut in by white walls of houses, with narrow windows, barred and grated, high up in the wall. At one point we hear a sound of monotonous chanting proceeding from an open door, and on looking in find a number of black eyed children, apparently from three to eight years old, sitting on the floor around their turbaned and long bearded teacher, and repeating their lesson after him. There is no furniture in the room except a hanging shelf to hold books, and one or two other little articles. The floor is covered with matting, which extends half-way up the wall, and on this teacher and pupils squat together.

The principal street of the town descends steeply to the harbor. A few of the shops are in the European style, but, generally speaking, the owner sits on the counter or the floor, with his goods arranged on shelves behind him and on either side. Tailors, smiths and shoemakers may be seen carrying on their trades in little ground-floor rooms, lighted only from the door and apparently without either window or staircase. — Travel.

THE BOOK OF THE HIDDEN NAME

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

AHASUERUS (Xerxes), was the King of Persia, reigning from India even to Ethiopia, from B. C. 485-465. In the third year of his reign, he made a great feast for all the officers of his kingdom. The magnificence of the feast was marred by the drunkenness of the king and his guests. The drunken king committed a great breach, by sending for his Queen Vashti, to appear at the feast and display her beauty, of which he had boasted. The queen refused to come, and was therefore divorced by the king. A royal decree was then sent forth that "every man should bear rule in his own house," for the king and his officers feared that Vashti's independent stand would make other wives unmanageable.

Esther, the comely young Jewish maiden, was chosen to be queen in place of Vashti. She was born of captive parents in Babylon. She was so gracious and beautiful, that she obtained favor in the sight of all who looked upon her. She was an orphan, who had been most tenderly cared for by her cousin Mordecai, who was one of the royal doorkeepers of the palace. He discovered a plot between two of the king's officers to murder the king. Through Queen Esther, Mordecai informed the king, and the officers were put to death.

A man by the name of Haman, for some unknown reason, was promoted to the premiership. He magnified his office by demanding that all should bow down before him as if he were a god, whenever he should pass by. Mordecai refused to bow down, claiming as a Jew, he knew but one God. Haman determined to revenge himself upon Mordecai. He formed a plan for exterminating all the Jews in the kingdom, in order that Mordecai, whom the king would not harm directly, might thus be slain. He offered a bribe to the king, if he would give permission to let the Jews be destroyed, as a people not profitable to have in his kingdom. The king forthwith delivered his seal ring to Haman, to make what proclamation he would. The writing was made, appointing the thirteenth day of March as the time for a general massacre of the Jews, and was sent to every part of the kingdom. There was, of course, great consternation among the Jews in consequence.

"Esther said: The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman"

Illustration and Application

This book of Esther presents the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man, together with Judgment and Salvation.

1. The Fatherhood of God. The book might be called The Book of the Hidden Name, for, though God is an invisible providence all through it, the name of God does not appear in it. Prof. Van Dyke's beautiful story of The Lost Word, might well be told to show what unspeakable loss it would be, if, by such a spell as the hero of that story allowed to be put on him, we too, should be unable in life's supreme moments to speak the name of God. How sadly that father missed it in the glad hour when his child was born, and in the sad hour when the child died! We recall also the wrestling of Jacob in the darkness with the mysterious stranger, when he exclaimed, "Tell me thy name." The name was not spoken, but he felt it, and in the morning he said, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is saved." So in the book of Esther we do not read the divine name, but we feel God acting in providence and redemption, and we exclaim, as we close the story, "I have seen God face to face as Lord and Saviour." There is yet another story that fits the case. An architect was forbidden by a king for whom he built a stately temple, to put any other name upon it save the king's; but the architect so built it that the very windows and arches would spell out his name for all observant beholders.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE IN ESTHER

1. It reaches everywhere. 2. It embraces all things. 3. It controls all men. 4. It surmounts all obstacles. 5. It demands human effort. 6. It honors human prayers. 7. It rewards self-sacrifice. 8. It furthers God's gracious purposes. 9. It manifests the unseen Lord.

In Esther we do not find the word God, but we find in it the very cross of self-sacrifice as Esther risks her life to save her people. How this story flows like beautiful variations on those two strains, God knoweth all; he loveth always. In Sicily there is a rock cave of wonderful acoustics, called "Dionysius' Ear," because of its shape. The acoustic properties of this cave are wonderful. A piece of paper snapped between the fingers, a whisper, even a breath, is focused to a certain point, and not only distinctly heard but greatly magnified. The banging to of the door resounds like a clap of thunder. It was used as a dungeon or prison into which State prisoners were put, and far up in the dark recess, where all sounds were focused, old Dionysius had a secret seat, which was accessible at will by means of a private entrance. Here he would sit and listen to the very whispers of his prisoners. In a very different spirit God hears every sighing of the prisoner unjustly oppressed; every falling tear of sorrow—hears that he may help. A Christian British soldier was talking over the fire. Very soon he was going back to West Africa. He told that on his shoulder-straps the War Office had lately ordered the letters to be placed, "N. N. W. A. F. F." They stood for "Northern Nigeria, West African Frontier Force." He and a Christian comrade sought to devise some motto that would fit the letters. The result was this—"No, Never Without A Faithful Friend." And that soldier has told since, that many a time the simple message was a help to him when he was far away from friends or Christian influences.

As we see the Fatherhood of God all through this book, working out in the protection of his people, while the divine name is hidden, Whittier's words seem fitting:

So sometimes comes to soul and sense
The feeling which is evidence
That very near about us lies
The realm of spiritual mysteries.
The breath of a diviner air
Blows down the answer of a prayer:
That all our sorrow, pain, and doubt
A great compassion clasps about,
And law and goodness, love and force,
Are wedded fast beyond divorce.
With smile of trust and folded hands,
The passive soul in waiting stands
To feel, as flowers, the sun and dew,
The One true Life its own renew.

2. The Brotherhood of Man. How hideous to the eye of the universal Father is all our unbrotherly conduct to our fellows, especially race prejudice, of which the worst form is the prejudice against God's chosen people! The hatred of the Jews shows itself murder indeed in the case of Haman, whose face lies in deepest shadow between the noble face of the beautiful Jewish heroine of this story, and that of Mordecai, in whom we see the Jews at their best. And by its best, every race should be estimated.

And by his own character and conduct alone, every man of every race should be judged. At last even Russia has decreed civil freedom to the Jews. It is more important that we should all decree freedom from race prejudice to ourselves. God's command is that we should call no man common or unclean, obedience to which would expel the opprobrious epithets from every Christian's vocabulary.

The Chinese boycott of American goods has called attention to another race prejudice in o un-American exclusion law, which sa that no laborer from the land of Confuciu however industrious and useful, may co to our country, when we should rath say that the unfit of every race sh be excluded and all others welcome Certainly race prejudice and Christ cannot live in t same heart. Richelieu is represented as saying, "Beyo the map of France my heart can travel not." Suppo Jesus had said: "Beyond the map of Palestine my he can travel not. Jesus for the Jews." If he had sa that we should not even know his name. He would forgotten like the anonymous Scribes and Pharisees his day, who stopped at patriotism and knew nothing the diviner brotherhood of man.

This lesson reminds us that human brotherhood at best is not an empty sentimentalism, but shows itself such courageous self-sacrifice as that of Esther, of whi here is a parallel in a boy. In a wild storm a sailor b and his father stood on the beach and saw a vessel shore going to pieces in the storm. "Father, I'm goi to try to save those men." "Nelson, if you do you w surely be drowned." "Father, I'm not thinking of l ing drowned, but I'm thinking of saving those men And so with a comrade he manned a boat. When th came back out of the fierce struggle with wind and wa with the saved crew on board, the boy said reverentl "It seemed to me as if the sea was smoother where t boat went, than it was all around us." "Nelson, I thi it was God." "I think it was, father."

3. Salvation. But the self-sacrifice of Esther and Nelson risking life to save others, pictures not only t beauty of heroic, self-forgetting brotherhood, but a the divine self-sacrifice of Christ, who more than risk his life that even his enemies might be saved.

How swiftly Esther a Mordecai sent forth t news of salvation when way was found by which t doomed Jews could escap Alas that we should not every power and talent find a way to get the ne of the great salvation the ends of the earth!

Shall we not be as mu in earnest for the redempti of our brothers who are h in the bondage of sin a selfishness, lost for bo worlds. Surely, in stud ing the story of Esth and seeking to be like h in recognizing for what have come to the Kingdo at such a time as this; shall not overlook the gr battle of American wom with the Haman of Mormo ism. Let the noblest a of self-sacrifice help us picture the "greater lov of the Crucified. A te phone girl proved hers an uncrowned queen wort to be named with Esth when a dam near the f tory where she work showed signs of giving wa and she remained at h post till she died to te phone warnings down t valley to save thousan who would otherwise have perished.

4. Judgment. And this brings us to the story of o who, seeking to get notoriety by repeating her act near as possible, only illustrated the doom of those w "neglect so great salvation." William MacGoly was wor ing on the sixth floor of a Minneapolis newspaper offi when some one rushed in and cried, "The building is fire—escape at once." But he only picked up his te phone, remembering the then recent story of the bra girl and wishing to become as famous, and began to te phone news of the fire to a central news agency. I looked out of his window to learn the progress of the fi and telephoned: "The fire is in the second story; I a in the sixth." Presently he reported it had reached t third, then the fourth, then the fifth. Then he rush out, intending to go down on the fire escape, but the fi was at his door and he could only close it and rush to t window and step out on the ledge. The people bel were appalled to see a man there above the flame Above his head was a telephone cable reaching acr the street. He seized it, and moved out, hand-over-han The people dared not applaud. They hardly breath when he paused half way to rest. He went on a few fe and stopped. His strength was giving way. One ha fell helpless at his side. There had been no time get blankets to break his fall. The other hand ga way, and he fell, a bruised corpse, into the street. The had been nothing to gain but notoriety by staying his phone. He had disregarded the warning to esca and forfeited his life. Far greater is the folly that disr gards the warnings whose neglect means the second deat

The Minister's Wife

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

TEN years had slipped by as a tale that is told, since Jessie Muir had been married to Ralph Donald. They had made no change in her, except as the rosebud changes to the rose. She was a tall and slender woman, gracious and stately, at the acme of distinction, now that she had entered the sunny region of the thirties. Her head was crowned with red-gold hair, which she wore in a great coil; her brown eyes were steadfast and serene; her face had the tender calm of a Madonna.

The minister was his wife's senior by twenty years. A big man, with shoulders stooping a little from bending in his study over learned books, his pursuits had left their imprint on his fine, grave countenance. He was a courtly-mannered man of great personal dignity, and it was rather a trial to him to condescend to trivial things. Social calling and tea-drinking were not agreeable to him, but beside a sick bed, or in the house of mourning, he was a comfort and a tower of strength.

The parsonage was a sunny little house, gay with the patter of children's feet, and crowded with the happy cares that belong to that joyous period of married life when parents have their little ones growing up under their eyes and in their constant guardianship. Yet all was not happiness there at this time.

For some months Mrs. Donald had been aware of a smouldering trouble in the congregation. Doctor Donald was slower to perceive it. The marked absence of the young people from the mid-week meeting, the falling off in the attendance at the evening service on Sunday, and the tardy payment of the pastor's salary, were signs to have warned a less preoccupied man, but he found every explanation for them rather than the right one—dissatisfaction with his ministry and desire for a change. The church felt unsettled and longed for another leader.

With her swifter intuitions, Jessie watched the brewing of the storm, but she said nothing to Ralph, there would be time enough when the clouds broke. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," was her motto.

"I wish, Ralph, dear," she observed one morning, as they were dressing, "that I could afford to buy cheaper clothes, mine are far too nice."

"I don't see why, Jessie," answered the husband, "your clothes suit you; and besides, as they really cost you and me nothing, they are much cheaper than duffs you could buy. Mary's box will be here to-day, and you and the bairns are sure to find it packed with treasures."

"That's just the difficulty, darling. I and my children, thanks to our wealthy kindred, are better dressed than most of our people, and it awakens envy and jealousy. If I could explain, it might be all right, yet I fancy Deacon Barnard and Mr. Squires would be incensed, if they thought the minister's family were not dressed out of the salary. The salary is not paid, as it is, till we are everywhere in debt up to our eyes; and if they knew our affairs, they are quite capable of trying to cut it down."

Doctor Donald shook his head reprovingly.

"Ah! Jessie, Jessie! sweetest of women and wives, why have you not more charity?" he said.

The good man went to his study for the few moments of private devotion, which, with him, always begun a new day; and his wife hurried forward the dressing of the children. Breakfast brought them all around the table, and just as they had finished the meal, the expressman drove up with Aunt Mary's semi-annual box —a larger box than usual this time.

"Wait till after prayers, and then daddy will open it," said the mother to the eager flock.

The box contained an outfit for every one in the household, the minister included. Other things, too, there were in plenty—soft fine towels, exquisite table linen, and beautiful delicate lingerie and chiffons for the toilet of the mistress of the manse. She knew that love had been outpoured in every well-chosen gift, and that the tailor-made gown and the dainty house-dresses would fit to a nicety, for Mary and she were of a size and shape to wear one another's clothes, but she knew, too, that critical looks would follow her down the aisle and into the minister's pew. She knew it!

However, what difference could it make. The fatal note of faint praise had been struck in the parish. People were saying, "Doctor Donald is a good preacher, but he doesn't win the young men," and "Doctor Donald is very profound, but he preaches over people's heads," etc., etc. Once a congregation listens to this voice of the siren, 'ware shoals. Reefs are perilously near.

The church in the next street, with a new minister fresh from the seminary, furnished a lot of new ideas about Biblical interpretation, and, endowed with a good stock of youthful magnetism, was filling up fast, and their church was being slowly depleted. A crowd in a neighboring sanctuary when one's own church is not full, is a terrible strain on trustees and deacons.

"It was a larger box than usual, this time"

Mrs. Donald, radiant as a lily in her gown of deepest wine-colored cloth, with her bonny group of children around her, sat in the minister's pew the next Sunday morning after the box had come from home, and heard her husband preach a sermon rich in spirituality and suggestiveness, from the text, "For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty." She wondered how that sermon could fall on stony ground, for she knew that the man who was preaching had come to the pulpit from an hour of prayer. Yet she felt that it was missing its mark. Never mind. God required only of a steward that he should be found faithful. Success is not his part of the enterprise.

Monday morning early there was a knock at the parsonage door. Deacon Barnard and Doctor Strong called and had an interview with the pastor. They lost no time in unfolding their budget.

"We have ventured to bring to your notice," said Doctor Strong, "a rather delicate situation, Doctor Donald. Personally, we have no complaints to make, but there are some of the strongest members of our church who feel that the best interests of the congregation would be served by a change in our pulpit. We are very reluctant to say it, but the church is not prospering, Doctor Donald, under your ministry."

Doctor Donald's face flushed painfully, but he replied in a calm voice:

"We have had the presence of the Holy Spirit in our midst, and there have been many conversions. The benevolences of the church have not suffered."

Deacon Barnard, a man of coarse fibre, put in his word. "Some of us have had to dive into our pockets pretty often, or everything would have suffered, and you ought to know it. The income has fallen off. We are business men, and we expect to run our church on business principles. The minister must get the income, or he is a failure. A younger man, Doctor, with a less extravagant family, would suit this place better."

Doctor Donald rose. "You need say no more, gentlemen. My resignation shall be placed in your hands before the month expires."

When the visitors were gone, Jessie rushed in and threw her arms around her husband's neck.

"It is the darkest hour of my life," he said, looking at her with eyes that gave her a heartache.

"Dark hours often come before bright ones, dear."

"I am fifty-two years old. I suppose I have reached the dead-line. I am thrust out and my work is discounted. Well, I must support my family somehow. If not in the ministry, I can be a day-laborer, Jessie. Thank God I am strong as a coal-heaver yet."

"You have always been a day-laborer, sweetheart," answered the wife cheerily. "Come, Ralph, let us leave this matter with the Lord, and then—it is a day of heaven's own glory, suppose we take the children and go on an excursion to the woods. We need fresh air and out-door freedom. We are not going under in this darkness, dear. We are going to await the Lord's leading."

Her face was divinely cheerful and fearless. For the instant the minister forgot the wound that he had felt, like a stab, when the deacon blurted out the clumsy truth, and, in a way, gave his pastor orders to pack up and leave. He forgot the thin pocket-book and the uncertain outlook. Here were two of them, with God, and what was there to worry about?

They made a day of it in the woods, and came home laden with golden rod and asters and clematis and bittersweet. The minister walked as if he had thrown off a load. The minister's wife was more a queen than ever, in her gracious bearing. As for the children, her trouble had not touched them, and they were bubbling over with fun and good spirits.

There were many who were grieved when the Donalds took their departure. Mildred Harrison, who was fading away with consumption, would miss her pastor and her pastor's wife. Old Mrs. Manson, who could not see to read, would be lost without the little visits from Mrs. Donald, that were so frequent and so welcome, and who else would spare an hour to read to her every Saturday afternoon? In many a household there was regret. But the ties that bound pastor and people were nevertheless soon severed.

"The future is all black," said Doctor Donald, after he had preached his farewell sermon. He and his wife were sitting in the study by themselves.

"No, my dear, the future is all bright and glowing. It is in our Father's keeping," said the wife.

She was right. The next morning's mail brought an invitation to Rev. Doctor Ralph Donald to become president of a college in the middle West. The way was clear of obstacles, and the Lord's day-laborer went to the new post of service.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

Peter L. N., Nevada. Can you tell me through THE MAIL-BAG when coal was first used as kitchen fuel? When were stoves invented?

Coal began to be used as a kitchen fuel as early as 1245, though not generally for two hundred years after. The oven was used in 1400 (the old-fashioned brick oven), and continued in use for hundreds of years. The fireplace, with its spit, crane and hanging pots was followed by the stove, invented by Count Rumford late in the eighteenth century.

W. S. W., Massena, Ia. What denominations have the largest number of communicants in the United States and in the world?

It is impossible to give absolutely reliable figures, as the latest reports are not complete; but in 1904 the figures for the United States were as follows: Methodists (all branches), 6,192,494; Baptists (all branches), 4,725,775; Lutherans (all synods), 1,715,910; Presbyterians (including Reformed), 1,661,522; Disciples, 1,235,798. The statistics for the whole English-speaking world, so far as it has been possible to collect them, are: Episcopalians, 29,200,000; Methodists, 18,650,000; Presbyterians, 12,250,000; Baptists, 9,230,000; Congregationalists, 6,150,000.

Reader, Los Angeles, Calif. Up to the present time, with a single exception, every organization of American women before which the Women's Memorial for the removal of the Mormon apostle in the United States Senate has been presented, has given it the most cordial endorsement. That exception is the United Daughters of the Confederacy, whose convention was held in San Francisco lately. Owing to an incomprehensible ruling of the president, Mrs. Smythe, that the Women's Memorial was "politics," and, therefore, outside the scope of the organization, the Daughters have been placed in an unenviable position. It was clearly explained by members from Utah and Kentucky that the Women's Memorial had no political object, but was a plea for purity, the integrity of the home and the preservation of our highest lawmaking body from the influence of Mormon apostolic participation in making laws for the nation. This, however, was either quite beyond the comprehension of the president of the organization, or, if understood, was deliberately ruled out for some purpose not yet made clear.

It is hardly conceivable that the ruling of the president could have been anything more than an inadvertence. Yet, even she must have known something of the character and object of the great moral campaign in which the women of America have been engaged for the last six months or more, and which has not the slightest relation to politics or parties. The leaders of the Women's Memorial movement will doubtless see to it that President Smythe of the Daughters is fully informed, so that she need have no further apprehension that President Smith of the Mormon hierarchy is in danger of losing his grip. And, in any event, the matter is not material, since the ladies of the United Daughters have a perfect right to sign the Memorial when they please, and, having no punctilious misgivings, and no hierarchical namesakes, they will probably do so.

Among the many letters that come to us regarding the Anti-Polygamy campaign is one from Mrs. L. C., Louisiana, who has been very active in getting signers for the Women's Memorial. She writes:

If we don't put the Mormons down they will have another war on hand before many years. It is a disgrace to the American nation to have such a nest of vipers in their very midst, and to let their representative sit in Congress with our lawmakers, is a stigma upon every member, an insult to every home in our fair heritage and a blot on every virtuous woman's name. So we say, out with such a menace to our homes and down with those who hold that their hierarchy is greater than our liberty or our Constitution. The Mormon hierarchy first, the United States second, is the basal rock of their creed.

H. S. S., Fentress, Va. 1. Who are the people indicated as called and chosen in Matt. 22: 14? 2. What is the meaning of binding and loosing in Matt. 18: 18?

1. This verse has caused unnecessary distress to many earnest persons, who think it implies that God acts capriciously in granting mercy. We know by experience that "many are called but few are chosen," but that is because they do not accept the offer with its conditions. The offer of salvation is made to all; they who accept it are chosen. They become God's people. They who will not submit to Christ, who love sin and will not give it up, are not chosen, not being eligible. You may be quite sure that Jesus will keep his promise to cast out none who come to him. 2. It was a phrase current among the Jews, equivalent to forbidding and permitting. Thus an act which was in doubt, as in Sabbath observance, and a person be anxious to know whether it was a sin to carry a walking-stick on the Sabbath, as it might be construed as an infraction of the law forbidding the carrying of a burden on the Sabbath, would go to the scribes, who had authority to bind or to loose. If they said he must not carry it, they were said to bind; if they permitted him to carry it, they were said to loose. This power Christ gave to the apostles in the matter under consideration, which was church discipline.

E. Y. C., Laramie City. Who was the author of the poem entitled, "The Bird with the Broken Pinion?"

Hezekiah Butterworth wrote it. He passed away recently at his home in Warren, R. I.

Catherine J., California. The manufacturer of liquor, the retailer, and the owner of property who rents it to either of the former, must share the responsibility for the sins of this man killing and debasing traffic. It is not our province to fix the individual or proportionate responsibility, however, nor to deal with individuals as such, but to condemn the traffic as a whole. Especially should we not undertake to rake over the ashes of dead sins, when the perpetrator has passed away.

A number of our readers have inquired concerning the "Reorganized Church" of Latter Day Saints and its connection with Utah Mormonism, and the points of difference between the two. These are very clearly set forth in the following communication from C. R. E., Jerry City, O.

While it is true that the Reorganized Church has no connection with the Utah Mormonism, nor with the "Adam-God" doctrine, blood atonement, or polygamy, it should be understood that they are followers of Joseph Smith, whom they hold as a prophet sent of God. They accept the "Book of Mormon" and the "Book of Doctrines and Covenants" as divine revelations given through Smith, and as being on a parity with the Bible. They claim to hold the beliefs taught by the primitive Latter Day Saints in the days of Joseph Smith, holding that true Christianity totally disappeared from the earth some 1500 years before Smith's time, and nowhere existed in the world till miraculously restored thereto through Joseph Smith in 1830. They teach that God is a material being and spirit a material substance, and utterly repudiate the Protestant doctrine that the Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation. They deny that the canon of Scripture is complete, but that additional revelations will be made until the end of time. These are the teachings under which early Mormonism gained its great impetus, and are the same ones promulgated by the emissaries of the Utah hierarchy. These doctrines, and the same "first principle" are common to both churches. They strike at the very foundations of current Christianity.

There are, perhaps, half a dozen times in a woman's lifetime when she is particularly anxious to look particularly well.

One such occasion is—Her First Reception. She is on exhibition. Her house, her clothes, her furniture, Herself, are subjected to the keenest scrutiny of her friends—and her enemies.

Let her be guided by the experience of thousands of women who have passed through this ordeal with flying colors. Let her use Ivory Soap, liberally, for the adornment of her own sweet self, for the gown she wears, and for the articles of beauty and value which surround her.

THE COLONIAL ENDOWMENT CONTRACT will enable you to accumulate a fund of $1,000 or more—in five, ten, fifteen or twenty years, by the payment of comparatively small sums—annually or monthly.

When you pay the first deposit, you immediately receive the COLONIAL ENDOWMENT CONTRACT. It agrees to pay you $1,000 at the end of five, ten, fifteen or twenty years.

For example, $34.20 a year, for 20 years, under this contract, or $684 in all, will give you $1,000 in 20 years. Or you can get a contract for $2,000 payable in the same time by depositing $68.40 a year, or $1.18 in all.

The Colonial Trust Co. Building

Pay this Company $50.10 a year for 15 years—$751.50 in all—on our contract for $1,000.

On a 10-year contract for $1,000, you pay $82.35 a year—$823.50 in all; or

If you want the $1,000 in 5 years, it will cost you $180.20 a year—$901 in all.

You may withdraw the entire amount paid in, plus the accrued earnings, in any year, by giving proper notice, as fully explained in our booklet, which we would be pleased to send you.

If you die before the contract is fulfilled and your legal representatives do not desire to continue payments as called for in the contract, immediate settlement will be made upon presentation of the proper proofs of death.

The Colonial Endowment Contract is a good investment, for all classes of people. A young man or woman will find it easier to save by money when a specific object is in view. The payments may be made on a certain day of the month or year—an incentive to regular saving.

Officials of Cities, Towns, School Districts, Corporations, etc., who are laying aside a sinking fund to meet a bond issue, will find this contract most useful. For example:

Your bond issue is $100,000, to run twenty years, a sinking fund of $5,000.00 a year would be required, in the usual way. The Colonial Endowment Contract would cost but $3,420.00 a year. The Corporation would save $1,580.00 a year for twenty years, or a gross sum of $31,000.00 in that time.

If you have a child whom you wish to educate or establish in business, the Colonial Endowment Contract will provide a way. Many parents find themselves unprepared to meet such emergencies.

The stability of the Colonial Endowment Contract is guaranteed by this bank. The strength and responsibility of The Colonial Trust Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa., are unquestionable. Its paid-up capital is $4,000,000.00 (four million); Surplus and Undivided Profits $6,000,000.00 (six million). Its Officers are all well-known men of wide experience in financial matters. The Board of Directors is composed of many of Pittsburgh's most prominent and successful business and professional men, representing almost every line of manufacture for which the Iron City is noted.

Besides, every dollar paid on these contracts is invested in gilt-edged First-Mortgage Bonds. The safety of your money is further guaranteed by the entire capital and resources of this Company.

You may make partial payments, instead of yearly, if preferred—depositing in our Savings Department. Four per cent interest will be allowed on such deposits, compounded semi-annually. Everything—buying the Contract and paying for same—can be done by mail. It is easier and as safe as if you made your deposits in person. We have thousands of depositors who bank with us by mail.

If your payments may be made to the Savings Department, instead of applying them upon the purchase of an Endowment Contract. All deposits of $1 and upward draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, compounded twice a year.

CONCLUDED FROM PRECEDING PAGE

Mrs. E. W. Sr., Farnhamville, Ia. What was "Black Friday?"

It was Friday, Sept. 24, 1869, when Gould, Fisk & Co. attempted to "corner" the gold market in New York. Gold reached 162½, and a great panic and many failures took place. The trouble, however, was shortlived. In English history, Black Friday was Dec. 6, 1745, when London was panic-stricken by the news that Charles Edward, the Pretender, had reached Derby, and was marching on the capital.

B. F. W., Baltimore, Md. The question "What kind or character of games or amusements can a Christian person engage in, or attend, and still retain his peace of mind?" has been agitating the public mind for many years, and is still an important unsettled question. Our young men and women in the churches are, many of them, full of life and spirit, and are active in their church, Sunday School and society duties, neglecting none of them, and still have time for a little recreation and amusement. It is unnatural to be otherwise. Human nature demands it. Just what that amusement shall be is the great question. I would suggest that a "Peace of Mind" conference be called, to settle as to what character of games, plays, entertainments, etc., are proper for Christian people to indulge in.

We do not believe that any "conference" such as you suggest would be able to reach a satisfactory conclusion on this subject. General rules might be formulated, but the individual conscience and the circumstances of the case must be the real basis of judgment, as, with few exceptions, there is no Scripture on the matter. Ordinarily speaking, we should say that proper recreations would include athletics of all sorts, on land or water, that are conducive to strength and physical development; all games, indoor or outdoor, that have not the gambling element attached; concerts, readings, receptions and a great variety of entertainments of the right kind. There are good and bad plays, and probably the same might be said of dances and card games; but the Christian will unhesitatingly cut these out of his list for two reasons: first, because the general tendency is opposed to spiritual living, and second, for the sake of example, lest he be the means of leading others into sin.

H. H. J., Monrovia, Liberia, W. A. 1. Why are all coins made round? Does it signify something? 2. Do you not think that the title D. D. (applying to most of the D.D.'s), would be rightly interpreted "donated dignity," instead of "Doctor of Divinity?" Would not the words Brother and Friend, as Jesus used them be better?

A majority of the coins in use by civilized nations are round, for the sake of convenience in handling. The Australian aborigines use pieces of greenstone and of red ochre as currency. Skins are currency among the Alaskan tribes. Cocoanuts, shells, whales' teeth, pieces of mineral, and even feathers and common salt have been used as currency. Metallic coins have been in the shape of rings and bars, but nearly all countries in modern times have adopted the circular form. 2. It is a matter of little moment. We think the proposed change unnecessary.

——, Aulander, N. C. What proportion of the railroad stock of the United States is owned by foreign capital?

Total stocks and bonds, about $13,000,000,000. Of the stocks, about $6,375,000,000, foreigners do not hold more than $500,000,000. Of the bonds, about $6,600,000,000, foreigners probably hold at least $1,500,000,000. In 1901-1902 it is estimated that over $500,000,000 came back from Europe. The foreign holdings of Penn., N.Y.C., Illinois Central and Atchison were greatly cut down. The above must be regarded as purely a guess.—C. M. KEYS, Railroad Editor Wall Street Journal.

L. D. S., Maxwell, Canada. A speaker, lately lecturing against Prohibition, quoted the State of Maine as being nearly as bad as any other State both in drunkenness and irreligion. He wished to prove the Maine law a failure. Please state in HERALD is this true?

No, it is not true. Under license the taxes in Maine had gone up in some sections from $16 to $22 per $1,000; there were only five savings banks in the State; one city of 5,500 population had three hundred saloons; the poor-rates were enormous. Under Prohibition, crime and pauperism have greatly decreased; taxation is correspondingly reduced; there are now nearly sixty savings banks and other associations, with aggregate deposits of $113,000,000, and four-fifths of the whole State is clean and clear from intoxicants.

A reader of this paper, P. H. L., Belleville, N. J., sends the following:

My minister has asked me to map out a plan of work for boys in our church. Probably many others, in solving this great question, how to win the boys for Christ, are equally interested. I would like to know the views of experienced workers as to the formation of clubs or societies to hold the boys and win them for the Master. Also as to names for such clubs, officers, plans of amusement, and methods of leading them to Christ.

We believe that a discussion of this character would be of very general interest, and we cordially invite our readers having experience in such work to write to THE MAIL-BAG, in order that others may be helped.

M. E. B., Franklin. 1. How far is it from New York City to the Bermudas? 2. How long does it take a steamer to make the trip? 3. Is it a good place for a person with weak lungs?

1. It is 750 miles. 2. About three days. 3. It is a great winter resort for Americans. The morning temperature is about fifty degrees, and rises to seventy at noon. Frost is unknown. Get Stark's Guide to Bermuda; write to Leggat Bros., booksellers, 81 Chambers Street, New York City.

"A Virginian Mother" writes to Dr. Klopsch in glowing terms of the movement for the expulsion of Reed Smoot from the Senate. She says: "Surely the women of America should be under a heavy debt of gratitude to you, for placing at their disposal so unreservedly the columns of your great journal, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has already won many splendid victories on the fields of Christian philanthropy and humane public service."

THE SECRET OF YOUTH

De Soto looked for the secret of youth in a spring of gushing, life-giving waters, which he was sure he would find in the New World. Alchemists and sages (thousands of them), have spent their lives in quest for it, but it is only found by those happy people who can digest and assimilate the right food which keeps the physical body perfect that peace and comfort are the sure results.

A remarkable man of 94 says: "For many long years I suffered more or less with chronic costiveness and painful indigestion. This condition made life a great burden to me, as you may well imagine.

"Two years ago I began to use Grape-Nuts as food, and am thankful that I did. It has been a blessing to me in every way. I first noticed that it had restored my digestion. This was a great gain but was nothing to compare in importance with the fact that in a short time my bowels were restored to free and normal action.

For two years I have had none of the old trouble. I use the Grape-Nuts food every morning for breakfast and frequently eat nothing else. The use has made me comfortable and happy, and although I will be 94 years old next fall, I have become strong and supple again, erect in figure and can walk with any body and enjoy it." A Home Blessing

Henry Ward Beecher was a constant advocate of sound life insurance. He taught his people never to expect Providence to do for them what they could do for themselves.

Unquestionably one of the greatest home blessings is a policy in The Prudential Insurance Company. It assures the perpetuation of the home and its comforts, to the family which otherwise might be homeless and shelterless.

When a man is taken away from his family, he can leave them few blessings greater than

Somebody's Boy

LIST to the ring of the midnight song;
'Tis somebody's boy.
The winds give to every wild echo a tongue,
Yes, somebody's boy.

The witch of the revel has waved her wand
Over somebody's boy;
And the spirit of evil has clasped the hand
Of somebody's boy.

Comes now a yell on the midnight air,
From somebody's boy;
Reckless, defiant and devil-may-care,
Is somebody's boy!

. . . . . .

Foul is the bed—madly dark the dank cell,
Where somebody's boy
Is writhing in torture, the veriest hell—
Yet, somebody's boy.

Waiting and watching, a mother's eyes weep
For somebody's boy.
The vigil, dear Father, O help her to keep!
For somebody's boy.

Throw 'round him, and over, thy Spirit to save,
This somebody's boy;
Ere fiends for his lost soul shall hollow the grave
Of somebody's boy.

Fill with thy Spirit, too, our hearts, we pray,
That somebody's boy
We may watch for, and snatch from the death-trodden way—
Yes, somebody's boy.

The Unity of the Godhead

In a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG, someone was troubled over the fact that the Bible speaks of God as one, and so thought that it meant one individual. A man and his wife are spoken of in the Bible as one, and Christ in John 17: 20, 21, 22, prays that the thousands of the churches may be one in the same sense that the Father and Christ were one. He goes further and prays that they may be one with himself and the Father, even as they are one. It plainly means one in mutual interests, character and aims. I Cor. 15: 28 shows that when everything shall become subject to Christ, then he himself will become subject to the Father. Rev. 22: 1-3 represents the Father and Jesus under the title of the Lamb as both occupying the throne. Col. 3: 1; Acts 7: 55; Rom. 8: 34 and Eph. 1: 20 represent Jesus sitting or standing at God's right hand. John says "The Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hand" (John 3: 35). The Saviour says in Matt. 28: 18: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." Many passages show that Father, Son and Holy Ghost are individually different, but are one in the sense that Christ taught that they were one (John 17: 11-22), and he desired his Church to be one in the same sense. Christ is our Intercessor (Rom. 8: 34; Heb. 7: 25 and Isa. 53: 12); and he is our Intercessor with the Father at whose right hand he is (I Peter 3: 22). There is another sense in which there is a oneness. In John 17: 23; 14: 23, Jesus speaks of entering in or becoming a part of those that are his. The New Testament in this sense speaks of Satan entering in and taking possession of Judas Iscariot. D. F. EASTON.

UNDERWEAR FOR WINTER.

The "Vellastic" Marks a Revolution in the Comfort and Cost of Underwear.

Men and women who are accustomed to regard winter as a period of colds, rheumatism, and discomfort, will appreciate the new kind of underwear that is fast coming into use. It is known as Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear, and unites low price with high value.

This underwear is exactly what its name implies—rib and fleece. That is, the rib runs lengthwise and the fleece is knitted in crosswise, thus combining warmth and elasticity.

No ordinary washing will shrink Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece in form or size. Its soft down and elastic nature remain uninjured.

Outdoor men especially appreciate the snug-fitting protection of Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece, preferring it to any other. Men's and women's garments 50c each.

THE WOMEN'S WAR

Notes of the Anti-Polygamy Campaign

FROM Texas comes an order from the State President of the Women's Christian Temperance Mission for 500 memorials, to be used at the W. C. T. U. Convention soon to be held in Brownwood, that State. These women express themselves, through their secretary, as wishing to do all that they possibly can against the terrible crime which is disgracing our country. Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard, the State President of the W. C. T. U., recently read a very strong paper before the Texas Women's Press Association, urging the press women to write against Mormonism. The memorial published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was also read and has also been published in all the leading papers of Texas.

A correspondent in Seattle, Wash., writes: "Let me exhort you to cry aloud, and louder and louder, still, for people East and West do not realize it is so bad. I have seen the blight and curse, having lived in Salt Lake City for four years, my husband being a minister. Truly, no words can describe the blackness of this diabolical system. May God save our women from its power, and soon make it impossible for women of other nations to come to our fair land to suffer."

Another woman writes: "I most earnestly hope the movement will be successful. Having lived among the Mormon people, I do not wish to see them gain more power."

A diligent worker sends in a second long list of signatures, saying: "Even in far-off Texas we are often visited by the Mormon preachers, who are so pleasing that many are deceived."

In almost every city, town and hamlet women are forming themselves into bands, dividing the work of getting signatures systematically, with splendid results, as attested by the thousands received daily by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. There is still time for more good work. Send for memorials, which will be mailed free.

The Rochester Democrat and Chronicle asks: "Shall all the testimony taken by the United States Senate in the Smoot case, showing the true character of present-day Mormonism, go for nothing? Or shall steps be taken to protect not only Utah but adjoining States from the growth of that vile and treasonable system?" Both questions are proper and pertinent, but our contemporary should understand clearly that the case against Smoot, as presented by the women of America, who really conducted the Senate investigation, is not based on individual conduct, but on the fact that he is the sworn representative of the polygamous, anti-American hierarchy, and therefore wholly out of place as a maker of laws for this nation.

The Northwestern Christian Advocate sounds the watchword of the campaign in these words: "No official of the Mormon Church should be permitted to hold a Government office while that Church permits its members to violate the Church's pledge to the nation. Respect for the nation demands that Mr. Smoot be excluded from the Senate."

The Chicago Standard (Baptist) says: "The evidence laid before the Senate in the case of Mr. Smoot has proved that the Mormon leaders have continued the polygamous relations they had formed previous to 1890; that some of them have contracted new polygamous marriages since that date, and that the Mormon Church still teaches polygamy as a religious doctrine and a duty . . . Mr. Reed Smoot, an apostle in the Mormon hierarchy, and as such responsible for the teachings and practices which are sanctioned by the church, was elected to the Senate." The Standard's inference is obvious: Reed Smoot should go.

A Great Genealogy

A contemporary reports the remarkable case of Mrs. Lucinda Watkins of Atterbury, Illinois. She is ninety-six years of age; her daughter is seventy-six; her granddaughter, fifty-four; her great-granddaughter, thirty-seven; her great-great granddaughter, nineteen; her great-great-great-grandson, ten months.

It is truly a matriarchal genealogy, and recalls the old saying, "The mother said, tell my daughter that her daughter should say to her child that her girl's baby-girl is ailing." And what a long line of croup, rash, and sleepless nights are involved in a series like that! These were bound to come in the succession, to be sure, but it is not often that one person lives long enough to see so much of it.

SELF-EXAMINATION *

TIMES for self-examination come to every man, and if he evades the duty some experience is liable to happen that forces it upon him. This duty is different from the introspection that is often carried to excess. It is possible for the Christian to ask himself too often such questions as, "Am I loving God more than I did? Is my faith as strong as it was?" The plant does not thrive if it is torn up at intervals to see if it is growing. But questions as to duty and conduct are always legitimate and beneficial. "Am I keeping my promises? Am I fulfilling my obligations? Are my life and example such as to do good in the world?" These are concrete matters, that may be answered without going back to first principles.

Such questions are necessary. There is liable to result from our contact with the world a carelessness and a laxity in the performance of our religious duties, that increase if there is not strict surveillance. Many have thought that only by secluding themselves from the world and spending their lives wholly in religious exercises could they lead a consistent life. But the monastic idea is not the conception of our Lord. To be in the world but not of the world, should be the aim of his followers. It is a difficult task, because the world necessarily exerts its influence and the company of worldlings tends to draw one into their ways. There is, therefore, all the more need for the counteracting effect of Christian society to tone up the spiritual nature. Daily communion with God is also an absolute necessity to one who is mixing with the world. Looking back over the past we must ask ourselves whether our hours of devotion have been hurried or neglected, and whether we have been regular in our attendance on the means of grace.

Besides these things, there is the question of example. Are we showing selfishness in our lives? In a crisis, do we act on the principles of the world, or of Christ? What do the people with whom we come in contact think of religion as it is expressed in our lives? Such questions ought to be asked and answered by every Christian.

*Topic of The Christian Endeavor Society for November 5. "Am I keeping my Christian Endeavor covenant?" Mal. 2: 5, 6; Ps. 51: 6; II. Cor. 8: 21.

Called Higher

Mrs. E. G. Kurtz of Oakland, Calif., died in March, 1905, aged eighty years and eleven months. Mrs. Kurtz was an old subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a devoted and remarkably intelligent Christian.

Mrs. Lufanny W. Skinner, of Reno, Nev., entered into life eternal on July 19, 1905. A loving mother and a faithful Christian has gone to her reward. Her home was always open to ministers of the Gospel, and she was not "forgetful in entertaining strangers." She was a consistent member of the Baptist Church for fifty years, and also an earnest reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and loved it very much.

Mrs. Hannah Bellas was born near Reading, Pa., Feb. 26, 1822, and departed from this life in St. Louis, Mo., July 24, 1905, at the age of 83. Mrs. Bellas was a most interesting conversationalist, for which so writes her daughter—she always gave THE CHRISTIAN HERALD credit. Turning from other magazines, she would point proudly to her favorite publication, saying, "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives the current topics of the day in so much less reading." Mrs. Bellas lived a devoted Christian, and her departure was marked by wonderful resignation and patience. Four daughters and two sons survive her.

THE TENANT

THIS body is my house it is not I;
Herein I sojourn till, in some far sky,
I lease a fairer dwelling, built to last
Till all the carpentry of time is past.
When from my high place viewing this lone star,
What shall I care where these poor timbers are?
What though the crumbling walls turn dust and loam
I shall have left them for a larger home.
What though the rafters break, the stanchions rot,
When earth has dwindled to a glimmering spot!
When thou, clay cottage, fallest, I'll immerse
My long cramp'd spirit in the universe,
Through uncomputed silences of space
I shall yearn upward to the leaning face.
The ancient heavens will roll aside for me.
As Moses monarch'd the dividing sea.
This body is my house it is not I.
Triumphant in this faith I live and die.

FREDERIC LAWRENCE KNOWLES.

A Visitor's Gift

As an illustration of the power of the Bible, Mr. S. L. Ginsburg, the famous missionary in Brazil tells the following story. When he was stationed at Campos he found a man who had been in possession of a Bible for six years, and that not only he but his family and employees were all so well instructed in the truth that it did not take more than two months to organize a church of fifty-seven members, which, in turn, founded two other churches.

When asked how he came to be in possession of the Bible, the old gentleman said that one evening he entertained a poor man who needed a night's lodging. After supper the visitor said: "I am poor. I have nothing to give you as a proof of my appreciation of your kindness; but if you have no objection I will ask the Lord to bless you and yours." He knelt down and offered such a prayer as surprised the old man, He had never heard such words before, and could not sleep the whole night for thinking of them.

Early next morning he was on the watch as the young man left his room, with a request that he would explain his religion, "for," he said, "I have never been touched before as I was last night, and I want to know something about it." Very modestly the young man replied that he was afraid to give any explanation, lest he should make a mistake, but added: "I have a little Book with me which will teach you all you want to know about God and how to pray."

So he gave the gentleman a Bible such as is commonly sold by the colporteurs for a few cents. This was the volume which had been so used of God, and it bore evidence of having been freely though reverently handled. The church of which he was the founder is still going on with all the fervor of its first love.

A Novel Farm Colony.

It is announced that Mr. John Arbuckle, the wealthy philanthropist, intends to erect a home at New Paltz, N. Y., for men and women, old and young, who need employment in the open air, and nutritious food, in order to bring them back to a condition of health that will enable them to withstand the wear and tear of city life. Ground has been broken and the plans and specifications for the building have been drawn. The home proper will be known as the "Colony Building on Mary and John Arbuckle's Farm." The Colony Building will stand on a knoll overlooking seven farms, comprising 636 acres. It will cost between $75,000 and $100,000, and will give a comfortable home to more than a hundred men and women year in and year out. Mr. Arbuckle desires, if possible, that its inmates be self-supporting. To be eligible for admission applicants must be incapacitated for competition in the regular walks of business life. Old men and women, unable to battle for bread with those younger and sturdier, will be welcomed. Young men and women who, by reason of illness or physical infirmities, cannot keep up with the pace will be sent there. The output of the farm will not be limited to agricultural products. The building not only will be fitted up as a home, but will furnish an ideal workshop for some kind of manufacturing work as yet to be determined upon. In the summer time, the inmates who are not employed in the fields will work there under conditions which will practically amount to being in the open air. In the winter the veranda will be heated.

WORK A PLEASURE

It Is One of the Real Joys Given Us.

"Postum Food Coffee has done more for me in two years," writes a Wisconsin young lady student, "than all the medicines and treatments I had employed to overcome the effects of the coffee poisoning that was killing me by degrees.

"I had all the familiar symptoms and suffered all the well-known tortures. My stomach was wrecked and I could not eat, my head ached almost continually, I became the nervous victim of insomnia, and the capacity for study deserted me. Of course this came on gradually, and without suspicion, for a long time, as to the cause.

"Two years ago a friend enthusiastically urged me to quit using the old kind of coffee and to drink Postum Food Coffee. I have never regretted acting upon the advice. As soon as the coffee poison was eliminated, the strengthening and nourishing properties of Postum began to build me up.

"Each day I gained a little, the color crept back to my cheeks, my limbs rounded out with new flesh, my complexion grew fair and clear again, my digestion improved, and now I can eat anything at any time, the nervous insomnia has left me and I sleep soundly at night and wake up refreshed. I have no more headaches, and mental work has become a pleasure to me." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

THE HEART'S CHARITY*

A RICH man walked abroad one day,
And a poor man walked the self-same way,
When a pale and starving form came by,
With a pallid lip and hopeless eye.

And that starving man presumed to stand
And ask for bread from the rich man's hand;
But the rich man sullenly looks askance
With a gathering frown and a doubtful glance.

"I have nothing," said he, "to give to you,
Nor any such rogue of a canting crew."
So he fastened his pocket and on he went,
With a soul untouched and a heart content.

Now this great owner of golden store,
Had built a church not long before,
As noble a fane as man could raise,
And the world had given him thanks and praise,
And all who beheld it lavished fame
On his Christian gifts and goodly name.

The poor man passed, and the white lips dared
To ask of him if a mite could be spared;
He stood for a moment, but not to pause
On the truth of the tale or of parish laws.

He was seeking to give, though it be but small—
For a penny, a single penny, was all;
But he gave it with a kindly word,
While the warmest pulse in his heart was stirred.

'Twas a tiny seed his charity shed,
But the white lips got a taste of bread,
And the beggar's blessing hallowed the crust
That came like a spring in the desert dust.

The rich man and the poor man died;
As all of us must, and they both were tried
At the sacred Judgment Seat above,
For their thoughts of evil and deeds of love.

The balance of justice there was true,
And fairly bestowed what was fairly due;
And the two fresh comers at heaven's gate
Stood waiting to hear their eternal fate.

The Recording Angel told of things
That fitted them both with kindred wings;
But as they stood in the crystal light,
The plumes of the rich man grew less bright.

And the angels knew by that shadowy sign,
That the poor man's work had been more divine;
And they brought the unerring scales to see Where the rich man's falling off might be.

Full many a deed did the angel weigh,
But the balance kept an even sway,
At last, the church endowment laid,
With its thousands promised and thousands paid;

With the thanks of the prelates by its side,
In the stately words of pious pride;
And it weighed so much that the angels stood
To see how the poor man could balance such good.

A cherub came and took his place
By the scales, with a radiant, shining face;
And he dropped the penny that had fed
White starving lips with a crust of bread.

The church endowment went up with the beam,
And the whisper of the great Supreme,
As he beckoned the poor man to his throne,
Was heard afar in this mortal zone.

Blessed are they who from great gain,
Give thousands with a reasoning brain:
But holier still shall be his part
Who gives one coin with a pitying heart.

The Practical Printer, by Henry G. Bishop, gives information on all the various parts of the printing business, with useful diagrams and tables. 200 pages. Price $1. Published by the author, at a Oneonta, New York.

Patriotic Studies, consisting of extracts from Government documents relating to moral measures in Congress 1888-1905. Compiled and printed by the International Reform Bureau, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C. 288 pp. cloth, 35 cents.

Miracles in the Slums, by Seth Cook Rees. A collection of thrilling stories by men and women rescued from lives of suffering and sin. There are many individual stories, some of them illustrated with the portraits of the central figure in the narrative. Mr. Rees' heart is evidently in the work of "rescuing the perishing," and he tells his experiences in the underworld with a sympathy which makes the reader wish there could be more such earnest laborers in the vineyard. The book is dedicated "to three hundred and fifty thousand of my fallen sisters in America; to three million homeless, friendless, tramping men; to one hundred thousand men and boys in penitentiaries, workhouses and jails; to one hundred thousand bootblacks: to the sick, destitute and unfortunate everywhere." Published by S. C. Rees. 533 North Pine Avenue, Chicago, Ills.

At the Sign of the Fox, a romance by Barbara. The author of The Garden of a Commuter's Wife writes in a happy, pleasant vein in this new story of a young woman of to-day, who "sees things as they might be." Her father, a country-bred New Yorker; her mother, one of the Brookes of Virginia, and her problem in the person of a sixteen-year-old brother, form an interesting family group. The other characters who go to make up the people of the tale, the misanthropical sportsman, the artist, the young man climbing the ladder of journalism from the bottom rung, are delightful companions as the reader follows them from chapter to chapter. The author, as in her former books, shows herself to be upon intimate and loving terms with nature. Her description of the "River Kingdom" is most delightful, and old dog "Tatters" proves himself a real person as the writer calls him. A delightful, wholesome story. Published by The Macmillan Company, 64-66 Fifth Avenue, New York; 372 pp. Price $1.50.

GOOD WORK
Among the Fallen Ones

A GOOD work, bearing ample harvest, is being done at the New York Westside Gospel Mission, which was founded in 1889 by Miss I. J. Freeland, a consecrated Christian lady. The first headquarters were at 587 Third Avenue, and a year later the Mission moved to No. 805 Third Avenue. After Miss Freeland's death which occurred soon afterwards, adversity seemed to frown upon every department of the Mission work. Abandonment of the field seemed inevitable, when Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, the founder of the "Door of Hope," generously assumed the burden of its support. It was then known as "The Door of Hope Gospel Mission." Outgrowing its accommodations, it was moved to its present location, 269-271 West Forty-seventh Street, New York.

In the fall of 1900, Miss Clemme Ellis, a successful teacher and earnest Christian, became superintendent of the Mission, and has continued to labor for God and souls in that capacity since that time.

Miss Clemme Ellis

A short time ago, Mr. and Mrs. Whittemore, owing to their many activities in other directions, expressed a desire to be relieved of the responsibility of the Mission, and Miss Ellis assumed it. She trusted that God would continue to prosper the work. Mrs. Whittemore kindly donated all the furniture for the continued use of the Mission, with the only proviso, that the Mission name should not be changed. Mrs. Whittemore will continue her spiritual interest in the work, and will contribute to its support. The workers are very grateful for all she has done. The actual expenses of the Mission are about $100 per month. The superintendent and workers receive no salary whatever.

Every night a Gospel service is held in the hall at 8 P.M., preceded by an open air meeting. On Sunday there is a preaching service at 10.30 A.M., and Bible reading at 4 P.M. Work among the children is growing. Sunday School is held at 2.30 P.M., and a service for children at 3.30 Saturdays. "Our open-air work," continued Miss Ellis, "is of peculiar interest to us, and has been greatly blessed. Among the attendants are many whose conversion was due to the influence of these meetings. One of these was formerly a saloon keeper. Almost every evening for five months he came from a pool-room near by, and joined the circle about us, and stood listening to the Gospel. Finally, coming inside our hall, he gave his heart to God. This man is now making an honorable living in a clean business, and is helping others to the light. Another case was that of a young man of good family, and formerly a successful business man, but who had become a drunkard and gambler. His heart was touched as he listened at our meetings, and he became a Christian. He is now one of our valuable workers. There are many who thank God for this Mission, and to whom it has been a spiritual birthplace. There is work to be done here. The prayers of God's people are asked, that he may continue to bless and prosper the work. Any financial assistance will be appreciated. Articles of clothing can always be used."

The officers of the Mission are Miss Clemme Ellis, superintendent, 309 West Forty-sixth Street; advisory board: Rev. William James, Rev. H. G. Fithian, S. Arthur Brown, Hugh Monro.

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP

From the poem by Antoinette A. Hawley, President Colorado W. C. T. U. Read at the Lewis and Clark Exposition Temperance Congress.

WE ask, this twentieth century in view,
"Lord, what is that thou wilt have me do?"
You all remember what the answer meant
To Saul of Tarsus. As he blinded went
On to Damascus, was his soul ablaze
With all the glory of these modern days,
When every treasured word of his should roll
Around the globe, to speak his fearless soul?
Nay, verily, the Pharisee whose pride
Of intellect and power had God defied,
Saw only agony and bitter shame.
In going forth to preach in Jesus' name;
Yet faltered not, and counted all but loss
To win the Christ, whose winning meant—the cross—
Meant stripes and hisses, and the scorn of men,
Once proud, indeed, to touch his garment's hem,
Meant chains and prisons, and a tortured breath,
A life of peril, and a martyr's death.
Yet, friends, I take it that the word that came
To Paul, in far Damascus, was the same
That comes to us, What must the answer be?
"Take up your cross to-day, and follow me,"
Words that are still far-reaching and sublime,
The Christian's marching orders for all time.

Hark! ringing down the years from Galilee,
"Take up your cross to-day, and follow me."
What cross? To lead a meeting? Fill with prayer
And pious speech the Wednesday evening air?
No! Just to lift, with shoulder sure and strong,
Your part to rid the world of sin and wrong;
Just to take up the ballot sheet, and say,
"Thy kingdom come," and help it come that way.
Just to stand true, to fear not gain or loss,
But bravely to ignore the party boss.
Never for silver your Lord betray,
Nor once deny him on election day,
But, careless of the world of bonds and stocks,
Dare follow Jesus to the ballot-box.
And hear him say, with voice clear, sweet, divine,
"We conquer still by Love's immortal sign."

Gospel Triumphs*

WHEN we remember how small was the company of Christ's followers at the time of his departure; when we think how insignificant they were in influence, in knowledge, and in culture, we realize what a divine religion Christianity must be, to have attained the position it occupies in our time. There are now in the world nearly five hundred million nominal Christians. Nearly one third of the world's population is called by the name of Christ. In an obscure corner of the world a Man is born, who preaches for three and a half years and then is sent to an ignominious death. He published no books, he issued no manifestoes. The world would naturally say he will soon be forgotten. Yet his power and influence have increased in every generation. So far from being forgotten in this twentieth century, there are now more people who hold him dear, who reverence him and own him Lord, than there ever were. What is the cause? What element was there in the seed he sowed that gave the plant its marvelous life? It must have been that in it there was the power of God. That man is more credulous, who denies the divine origin of Christianity than he who accepts it.

The inference is obvious. We have in our hands a religion of infinite power and attraction. There can now be no question of the fact. It has been tested, and has borne the test. The Gospel has been preached to men of culture and has won converts from among them. It has been carried to the poor and they hear it gladly. It has been sent to the heathen savages and thousands of them have found it adapted to their lives. It transforms the nature, and it does that most stupendous of miracles, changes character and conduct. What, then, is our duty? Shall we keep it to ourselves? The responsibility of such a course would be tremendous.—What would be said of people, who knew that they had a remedy for a disease of which multitudes were dying every day, if they did not make known the remedy? For long centuries this was the course of the church. But now there is an awakening to the responsibility. The world is open to the proclamation of the Gospel. Shall we not avail ourselves of the opportunity? The work does not halt for lack of men. It is the lack of money that cripples the missionary societies. This obstacle it is the duty of the church to remove. Shall it be said that Christ's followers withhold the means for obeying his command to preach the Gospel in all nations?

The Divine Leader

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WE live in an age of materialism, and the Church of Christ has come under its power, and lives more in the visible than the invisible; more in the outward than the inward; more in the flesh than in the Spirit. Our most loving Lord gave himself for our sins that he might deliver us out of this present evil age (Gal. 1:4, R. V.); from its power and from its spirit. How should we be ready to meet our Lord when he comes, if we are not separated from the world of time and sense? How can we, while we remain here, help men from the bondage of things seen and temporal, if we ourselves are under their power? It is the good fight of faith to keep in touch with the invisible, and out of reach of the spirit of bondage to the visible, which reigns in the world; and, grievous to say, in the Church also.

It is no accident, but the distinct hand of God, that tidings of the revival in Wales should have reached all parts of the world. But O how slow is the Church of God to understand what God has to say to us by it! To those who have eyes to see, the great feature of the revival is the return to primitive Christianity in the distinct recognition of the personality and the authority of the Holy Ghost in the assemblies of his people. There are many earnest ministers and evangelists throughout the world who are praying for, and seeking to further, a revival, but who fail to recognize the presence and the majesty of the Holy Ghost, because he is invisible. They pray long for the Holy Spirit in the assemblies, but they cannot conceive of his presence independently of man; they invite the Holy Spirit to direct the meetings, but they look that he should direct through them—they cannot conceive of the invisible God leading the meeting; and thus he is grieved, and retires. There were those in Wales who "endured as seeing him who is invisible," who honored, recognized, and humbly welcomed the Holy Ghost in their midst, and retired from the leadership, leaving him to direct the worship. Those who have been present at such gatherings, where there was distinct and instant obedience to the Holy Ghost, can never forget that holy presence and power; and the way in which sinners bowed down in the felt presence of God, without any human pressure, and hearts and lives were changed, not through eloquent teaching or persuasive pointing to Christ by some earnest worker, but by their own immediate contact with God.

When Jehovah came down on Mount Sinai (Exod. 19:20), it would have been a terrible insult to him on the part of Moses if he had taken the control of that holy meeting of God with his people. But Moses only obeyed God by sanctifying the people and bringing them out of the camp to meet with God. Then he waited until "the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder." He spoke, and gave his orders, and Moses obeyed—he did not lead. The line of the Welsh revival has been on the line of obeying the Holy Ghost. It is possible that, with some, the voice of their own spirit may have been mistaken for that of the Holy Spirit; but God saw in their hearts loyalty to him, and accepted according to that which they had. Many have wondered at the blessed results of these meetings, and some have set it down to the personal influence of Mr. Evan Roberts. He would probably be the very first to say, "Do not dare to attribute to any man the work done by the living God—God the Holy Ghost."

Whence comes this sin, so almost universal in the Church of Christ among all nations? Surely it proceeds from that practical unbelief which must have the evidence of the senses for everything, and which is a proof of how little we have lived in real communion with an unseen God.

INVEST YOUR SAVINGS

In ST. LOUIS REAL ESTATE.

$10 DOWN and $5 Per Month

Will purchase any unsold lot in our subdivision. This delightful location is without a peer as a residence location, and contained within its limits are the most desirable building sites in the United States. If you can save $5.00 per month, you can make a purchase that will show greater increase in value than city real estate in any other part of America.

Recently we addressed one of our customers, asking him to state in writing exactly what his profits had been on lots purchased in Edgewood Park. His letter follows:

FRANKLIN INVESTMENT COMPANY, St. Louis Mo. "GRLENWOOD, Mo., August 10th, 1905.

DEAR SIRS: Within the past thirty days I bought from you in Edgewood Park twelve lots on your regular payments of $10.00 cash and $5.00 per month on each lot. During the month I sold the twelve and have realized a net profit of $1,000. Very truly yours, A. C. THOMPSON."

(During the week of August 20th Mr. Thompson bought five more lots.)

This opportunity for a careful and profitable investment is probably one of the best in America. Past experience shows that St. Louis real estate is advancing at the rate of about 20% a year, and this advance is not due in any measure to inflated values or wild speculation, but to our gradual, healthy increase in population, wealth and manufacturing enterprises. You can participate by paying a small amount monthly.

EASY PAYMENTS.

Heretofore the mechanic or clerk, working for a moderate salary, has been unable to take advantage of the many excellent opportunities to purchase St. Louis real estate simply for the reason that he could not pay down the amount of cash required. Under our method of easy payments, however, anyone can share in the profits resulting from St. Louis' wonderful progress.

If you want to be financially fortified against the inevitable "rainy day" or protect your family against possible future reverses, follow the example of the successful St. Louis business men, many of whom, starting at the bottom of the ladder, have risen to positions of power and greatness in the business community by investing their savings in the "Gibraltar of all securities," St. Louis real estate.

The growth of our city has been steady and substantial. Each year the wealth of this solid old town has increased until now she ranks as one of the great money centers of the world, a city where strikes do not occur and where banks are not affected by panics. It is the fourth city of the United States and commands the most rapidly growing trade territory in the world, a territory in which more miles of railroad are being built than in any other portion of America, and showing the greatest increase in wealth and new business enterprises during the past two years of any trade section of the United States. This means that what the development of the Northwest did for Chicago the development of the South and Southwest is doing for St. Louis.

That our progress is legitimate and healthy is evidenced by the fact that during the past year 190 new manufacturing enterprises, with a combined capital of $17,436,000, located in St. Louis, and the increased prosperity of our people is shown by the large increase in new homes that are going up. During the month of June, 1905, the amount of building was 82% greater than for the month of June, 1904, and the building permits for July, 1905, were 139% greater than for the corresponding month of 1904. This healthy showing has much to do with the confidence that holders of St. Louis property have in the outcome.

THE PERFECT INVESTMENT.

There are many ways of investing money, but there is no safer investment nor one surer of a profit than St. Louis real estate. The aim of the wise investor is absolute safety and liberal profits. St. Louis offers both and stands in striking contrast to all forms of speculative enterprises and can be safely termed a perfect investment, being one that gives the greatest profit consistent with absolute safety.

FREE DEED.

To any one purchasing from us, we agree, in case of death, to give to his heirs or assigns a warranty deed, without further payment.

The opportunity to share in the profits resulting from this splendid condition is open to you, and it matters not whether you are a man of moderate means or one with a surplus to invest. Thousands of dollars have lately been made and are now being made by conservative investors in St. Louis real estate. Not only have fortunes been made by those who bought early in the older sections, but others who bought more recently in the newer sections have made even greater profits. Two years ago property that could have been bought for $50 per front foot is now selling for from $100 to $200 per front foot. Just as good an opportunity is offered you to-day.

DON'T WAIT.

Many a man who is "waiting" to-day to find a safe and profitable investment for his savings was in the same frame of mind five or ten years ago. He lost his opportunity then. He is passing it by to-day. The other man bought and made money. He is buying to-day and making money. The "waiting" man's time never comes. Do not procrastinate like the "waiting" man, but put your savings into a well-selected St. Louis property, an investment that contains no element of risk. The growth is rapid and values are constantly enhancing.

For the benefit of outside investors who are unfamiliar with St. Louis' wonderful growth and resources and the opportunities here offered for the right kind of safe investments, we have recently compiled a book entitled "HOW AND WHERE TO INVEST." It is free for the asking. Send for it to-day.

Gospel Tours in China

Missionaries write of the Romance, the Privation, and the Encouragements of their Work There

FROM a number of missionaries in various parts of China, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is this week in receipt of a budget of letters containing most encouraging accounts of the progress of Gospel work in that distant land. From those missionaries who are engaged in Orphanage work, both near the coast and in the interior, come reports of the steady growth of that most valuable form of missionary effort. In China, as in India, Africa, and other heathen lands, the workers find that the winning of the children to Christ, is, to a very large extent, the key to the situation.

The "Three Mighty Men" in Chinese mission work, known to the Christian world as such for many years, are Dr. W. A. P. Martin, Dr. Griffith John, of the London Mission, and Dr. J. Hudson Taylor. A photograph of this great trio of workers for Christ was taken recently, and has been forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mr. Lewis Jones of Hankow. It was the first picture ever taken of Dr. Taylor. He passed away a few days later. His death is a great loss to China, and is mourned by none more sincerely than by the Chinese converts, who loved him greatly.

One of the American missionaries, who lately spent a short furlough in the United States, is Mrs. J. Woodberry, of the Shang-hai Gospel Mission. Her story is one replete with interest, and full of inspiration to those whose highest hope is to go to the Gospel field.

"I was a minister's daughter and early called to the Regions Beyond," she writes. "My husband, also, was called to 'go into all the world and preach the Gospel.' We consecrated our four children to the Lord. Guided to China, we prepared for our life-work, and were ready to go at the close of the Chino-Japanese war. At last we reached Tien T'sin, North China. Nothing was familiar but the sky, bending above us. The first Sabbath day, at the Union Church, two seats filled with Chinese students from the First Imperial Medical College of China greeted our eyes. All spoke English. Our questions met the response that 700 students in the various Imperial Colleges and Tien T'sin University spoke English; and so the Word which we had come to teach was within easy grasp!

"Next night they were invited to our home, and the 'good news' was eagerly listened to, around our own fireside. Converts multiplied, until the entire graduating class of the Medical College were won for Christ, and desiring to be sent as missionaries to their own people. Detachments of students went with us everywhere on the streets of the city, native and foreign, and helped us sell Gospels when lessons were done. They presented a strange sight, with their silken robes and animated faces, standing by the wayside, offering the 'Bread of Life' to the hundreds of passers-by."

There were many severe trials during those early years in the new field. Mrs. Woodberry's eldest son, Roy, was accidentally drowned in the Pei-ho river, and her husband and the youngest child were stricken with severe sickness. But faith in God sustained them through it all and the work went forward. Gospel boat journeys on the Pei-ho resulted in many conversions, and the Word was given to the people of some eighty towns and villages along the river. Among the converts was Captain Li-Ho, senior captain of the North China squadron. Soon after his own conversion he began work distributing the Word on the flagship. Dr. Wong, another convert, who had become an evangelist, was also a very active worker.

"My husband and Dr. Wong started on a Gospel journey of 1,400 miles," continues Mrs. Woodberry, "selling and preaching the Word. From Peking, down the coast to Canton, 100,000 Gospels were scattered, and the work of substitute evangelists in many provinces began to take shape. In each of the eighteen provinces of China, and also in Mongolia, Tibet and Annam (twenty-three in all), substitute evangelists were appointed. Many sold their silk garments, watches and chains and keepsakes, to fill that first student missionary treasury in North China. Several students individually supported a substitute evangelist in some distant province, about $3 gold (American) per month being the salary. Students unable to do it alone banded together. Our American consul, Mr. Read, took a substitute evangelist in Szchuen, in memory of his famous Cheng Tu expedition. Many friends sent contributions.

"The Boxer work demoralized our forces for a time, and in 1902 Shanghai became our home. Since then new fields of opportunity have risen around us, and two successful campaigns were planned in Fukien and Hunan by the students themselves. A Gospel boat was bought in Fuchow, and a missionary tour of the rivers begun. Cloisters of priests on the mountain sides were visited, and the poor had the Gospel preached to them by river and hillside. Wondrous things were accomplished likewise in opening the door in Hunan.

"At the end of ten years of blessing and seed sowing, we now stand at the dawn of a new missionary era in the Far East. It now costs, on an average, $5 gold a month

GENUINE REPENTANCE

TEXT: Luke 15: 19, 21:

"I am not worthy to be called thy son"

THAT the repentance of this young man was thorough and genuine is attested by its results. It led him to turn and retrace his steps. It brought him back to his father. It reinstated him in the home, and restored him fully to all its privileges and duties. He was "lost," and his repentance "found" him; "dead," and it brought him to life. It atoned for the grief and pain that he had caused his father; it replaced family sorrow by joy. An experience that can work such blessed marvels is worthy of our closest study.

Such study must begin with some scrutiny of his general character. And this is best seen against the background of the character of his brother. This brother was industrious, thrifty, home-loving; content with the routine of the farm; yielding his father constant obedience; but he was cold, calculating, cynical; without affection, lacking in generous impulses, capable of cherishing a grudge, unable to forget a fancied or real wrong, even under the most urgent incentive to be open-hearted, kind and forgiving. Selfishness ruled him. He found his pleasure in counting the gains of his daily toil. His chief thought about his returned brother is that he had wasted his patrimony, and was now to live upon his father, which meant taking that much from what he, the elder brother, should inherit.

He is envious of the love and favor that the father is showing the repentant brother; impugns the justice of giving him a feast; broods over the thought that no feast had been given him. He repudiates relationship to the offender. Not "this my brother," but "this thy son." He is "angry" at his brother for returning; at his father for receiving him; at the company for convening to celebrate the event. His father's natural, human, pathetic joy does not melt him; nor his gentle, tender, entreaties move him. "He will not go in." So the feast proceeds, with the one man absent, who, next to the father, should be there; not only absent, but casting upon the brightness the shadow of his wrath and jealousy; chilling the father's joy and the returned brother's gratitude; pouring into the festal cup of otherwise unalloyed happiness the bitter poison of cold, cruel, unrelenting selfishness.

The Prodigal's Character

Now the younger brother was the opposite of all this. Like all spendthrifts, he was generous and open-hearted. He had ambitions that the farm could not satisfy. He longed for companionships that its isolation did not afford. He craved other pleasures than those that come from daily honest labor, thrift, and a quiet life. He wanted to see the world. These are not in themselves evil things. Instead, they are good things. They mean enlargement for the individual and progress for society. They strike out new lines of business; establish mauufactures and commerce; build roads and fill them with traffic; found cities and make them centres of wealth, influence, and power. Were all men as industrious and thrifty as the elder brother, yet as unambitious and selfish, the great movements of mankind would never have been possible; the race would still be nomads, with grazing and agriculture as its sole industries.

Now, this wide-awake, frank young man asks for his patrimony. If he was of legal age to receive it, the request was not in itself wrong. It was foolish, as the result shows. And the father was weak in granting the request. He should have known this son better than to entrust him with money that he was certain to waste, and worse than waste.

Then, as soon as he can make his arrangements, this young man leaves home. This again is not in itself wrong. It is the course of nature, the spontaneous prompting of the human heart. Parents often stultify and condemn themselves in opposing their children's leaving home, and, when unable to prevent it, making themselves and the rest of the family wretched over it. No doubt the parting is sad, and the house lonely. But the children are doing just what the parents did; what men and women have always done, and apart from which the world would stagnate.

And in this young man's case there may have been steady pressure from within the home. He seems to have lacked mother and sisters. His older brother could not have been good to live with. The father was not the man to hold an even hand between them. We can readily imagine the younger brother saying to himself: "Certainly, I can find a happier place than this."

And here we begin to see a radical defect in his character. In his own way he is as selfish as the older brother in his. If the home was unhappy for him, it must have been more unhappy for his father. Should he leave only the stern, calculating, uncompanionable son in it, and thus add a great loneliness to his father's already desolate lot? This he seems not to have considered. His one thought is to have his money and be gone.

Moreover, it is not to go in order to establish for himself a new home. This again is the course of nature in response to a deep, normal impulse. But there is in it a certain fine unselfishness. It means the surrender of a large share of independence; the acceptance of many limitations; the assumption of heavy and permanent responsibilities. We find no sign of all this in the younger son. Nor of any sense of stewardship of property. He is a spendthrift, pure and simple, and entirely ungrateful for the thrift that he is spending. Different as are the two sons in temperament and conduct, they are alike at heart in a rude, inconsiderate self-assertion.

Bad Friendships

But though receiving his patrimony and setting out for himself are not intrinsically evil, the use that he makes of both the freedom and money is as wicked as it is foolish. He begins his career by seeking bad friendships. Like every silly young man with money, he becomes at once the victim of greedy sharpers. They are more than willing to help him run through his fortune in "seeing the world." "Life" to them means the worst in life, unrestrained self-indulgence; pleasure, however degrading and destructive; the gratification of all appetites to the point of satiety.

It is a short road, and a steep descent. Money gone; companions gone; self-respect gone; ability to enjoy either vice or virtue gone; hungry, ragged, friendless, desolate; ashamed, but unrepentant; hopeless, yet driven by hunger, this fine, gallant, ambitious, open-handed young fellow, of all things in the world for a Jew, a swineherd! Such is the inevitable end of selfish pleasure-seeking; of forgetfulness of family ties; of disregard of duty; of indifference to the value of money hardly earned and patiently saved by another; of laudable ambition corrupted by excesses and bad companionships; of seeing the world with self-indulgence as one's only guide.

And now the time for repentance has come. Repentance, alas, does not always come with the time for it. Often, instead, a sullen hardness; a consuming shame, that has in it only the sense of disgrace, but not of sin; an abject despair that is incapable of believing a return to better things possible. Then there is wretchedness of the bitterest sort; unrelieved even by the temporary indulgence of appetite; or by any glimmer of hope that forgiveness may come to restore something of the wasted life. Such stolid, sodden misery often drives men to perseverance in evil courses, though they afford no pleasure; to that fiendish delight in dragging others down, which is the last and worst perversion of our human nature. "They sleep not, except they do evil; and their sleep is taken away, unless they cause some to fall." When even this palls, there remains—suicide.

Misery and Degradation

Happily this younger son escaped so awful a fate. He did not go on to the point where repentance was impossible. He did not become a tramp, a beggar, a pauper, content to live on others' industry. He sought and found work, though such work! His misery softened instead of hardening him. True, the softening began rather sordidly in his hunger. Many a man would have been only frenzied and crazed by the consciousness that even the swine's food was denied him; would have cursed his hard fortune, and sunk deeper into the slough of despond. This man's capacity for salvation lay precisely in his not doing that; in turning at just this point to a better mind. The li indeed only faintly glimmers at first, but it slo brightens. His first returning self-consciousness is of sin, but of folly. "What a fool I am to star Why should I perish here with hunger, while father's hired servants have bread enough and spare? What a fool I have been!" Still selfish, see. Thinking only of himself, of escaping starvati

Self Reproach

But gradually the thought of his father's home table leads to thought of his father. He recalls young manhood, boyhood, childhood. He thinks ba ward as far as memory can avail; thence onward y by year, day by day, to that unhappy hour when blindly, wilfully left home. It all glows now with father's love. He had often been headstrong, diso dient, ungrateful, unkind; his father had been obli sometimes to restrain, chide, even punish; but w time and distance to clarify his vision, he sees cle that beneath and through all has been unfailing ten ness; that his father's one dominant purpose has b the good of this dear son. He realizes something how paternal solicitude shielded him in infancy; lowed every youthful step; guarded him from a h dred perils, at the time quite unsuspected.

He perceives how the father's life was wrapped u the son's; a thousand proofs of it come to him tha had never before observed. He appreciates what parting, that he took so lightly, meant to his fath how desolate had been that loving heart while he immersed in pleasant vices that left him no time to think of home. He pictures the ceaseless anx that he had not been at pains to relieve even by occasional message. He reflects that throughout this ingratitude and neglect his father had never proached him; had never intimated that a year, a mo more would exhaust his patience; had never disow him, nor forbidden him to return. He is sure that door is open for him; that a welcome and forgive await him. In the glow and hope of it all, he says, "I will arise, and go to my father."

A Wise Decision

At once he sets out. No doubt that homeward j ney was marked by many misgivings. Was his fat still living? If not, could he hope for kindness f his brother? Was it reasonable to believe that father still loved him? All that his father had done said, "Yes." All that he himself had of done said, "No." Would not the father, whatever lingering affection for his son, be ashamed of the sw herd? Could he take his debased self, his rags, nauseous smell of the swine, to that dear home? C he cast his shame and beggary into his father's ar He must often have stopped in the road, must so times have turned back. Fear struggled with hope for the moment overcame it, but he took heart ag and went on. True, his case was desperate; he n get home or starve. But that is no longer his mot He has risen above that. The thought, not of his dire need, but of his father's priceless love, is dra him homeward. His resolve was not, "I will arise find food," but, "I will arise and go to my father."

That purpose held and prevailed, as is shown by first words. They are the very words that he framed in the far country. If the first clause is so what vague and general, the second is entirely fra direct and explicit, "I am no more worthy to be ca thy son." This, not the chance to eat, prompts the quest for a servant's place. This sense of unworthi shows the father that he is still worthy; that it is merely a distressed, but a repentant, son that has turned; hence the robe and shoes and ring and fe hence the great joy.

Mark now how definite is this young man's sens unworthiness. Nothing is more common than a gen sense of unworthiness, and nothing is more empty unavailing. The protestation of it is often only conventional, a thin cover for pride, a transparent bid praise. "I am unworthy of this honor," we say, this promotion, of the trust that you repose in me the compliment that you pay me." Usually this is part of a formal exchange of civilities. We do not for a moment intend to be taken at our word. We have no thought of shaping our conduct upon our word.

But this man had come all the way home with the fixed purpose of governing his life by what he said. All his fluctuations between hope and despair had not turned him from the resolve reached among the swine, to secure if possible a servant's place in his father's house; and this because he had clearly seen himself unworthy to recover the son's place that he had forfeited. "I am not worthy to be called thy son." That is the culmination of his repentance, as it is the pledge of his father's welcome and forgiveness.

And herein surely our Lord sets forth both God's readiness to forgive and the terms on which we may be forgiven. Of God's love and mercy we are so well assured that we may now take them for granted. About the repentance that justifies their action in any case we are not apt to be so clear. Not Herod's "exceeding sorrow" for himself because of his headlong blunder and crime can lay a foundation for pardon, since it does not even tend to reform the life. Herod thought himself wretchedly unfortunate, but not for a moment unworthy of his throne. But this man, in the light of his father's character, had seen himself unworthy of sonship. His saying so is no empty form of words, but the attested utterance of his inmost heart.

How many sons and daughters have thus been saved from utter ruin! They have been going downward; throwing themselves away. They have lost self respect. All appeals to self-interest have fallen upon their ears unheeded. At last the secret spring of regard for father, mother, an honored family name, has been touched. In the light of this worthiness they have seen themselves unworthy. What neither personal fear nor personal hope could do this sense of shame has done, bringing a repentance whose genuineness is proved by permanent reformation of life.

And a motive, infinitely stronger the moment it is rightly apprehended, is found in the sense of unworthiness to be called sons of the Heavenly Father. If you, dear friend, can sincerely say to God, "I am not worthy to be called thy son," say it, not as a conventional form of words that you suppose yourself expected to use, but as the genuine utterance of your consciousness that you have abused your Father's love, taxed his patience, disregarded his feelings, neglected his law; then you have the true repentance that will never need to be regretted. And you can learn to say this with utter truthfulness if you will study and meditate upon God until his love and compassion become to you assured realities. Because this son knew his father he came home to restoration and joy. "Acquaint thyself with thy Heavenly Father and be at peace."

The Bible Class of Deaf Mutes at Dr. Partridge's Church

Rev. Warren G. Partridge, D.D.

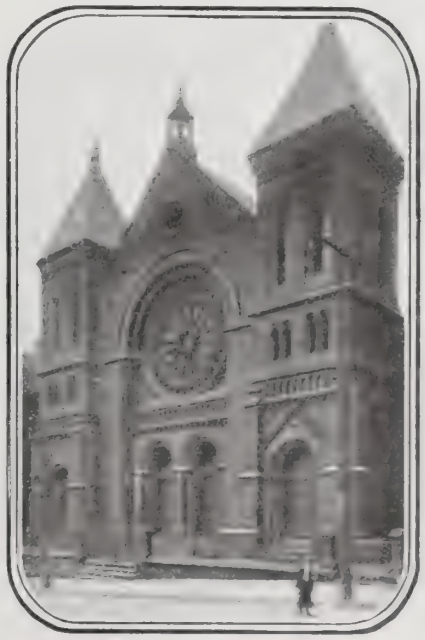
An Institutional Church Honored

THE fact that the exhibit of the Fourth Avenue Baptist Church in Pittsburg has just been awarded the Grand Prix at the International Exposition in Liege, Belgium, by the jury in Social Economy, calls fresh attention to the work of this historic institution, which has adopted the most modern methods of religious activity. Rev. Warren G. Partridge, the pastor, who directs the organization, with its various branches, had previously been a leader in institutional church work in Cincinnati. Under his inspiring leadership, the Fourth Avenue Baptist Church "does things," and this means much in the strenuous city of Pittsburg. Dr. Partridge believes that the Church should be the centre of social and educational, as well as religious influence, and that if it is situated in the congested part of the downtown districts, it should open hospitable doors to the homeless.

Perhaps the most striking feature lately established has been the supper and "social hour" which each week precedes the prayer-meeting. Through this, he has been able to attract men who would otherwise go to their homes for the evening meal, and could not well return to the church from houses in distant suburbs. This feature has greatly increased the attendance at the mid-week meeting. Wednesday evening, too, has come to be the meeting night for various committees. This crowding of work into one evening carries out the Church idea of concentration. By remaining in the rooms between 6 and 10 P.M., the pastor is able to dispose of much of the detail of the industrial plans.

In the Fourth Avenue Baptist Church the Christian Endeavor Society retains its original place with the national organization founded by "Father" Clark, although it cordially co-operates with that Baptist Young People's Union. This alliance with a world-wide body is in the spirit of the missionary traditions of the Church. The Endeavor movement here is far-reaching and has even embraced a company of deaf mutes in the congregation, whom it was possible to attract by interpreting the sermon to them in signs. An interpreter was engaged for this work, and, standing by the side of the pulpit but concealed from the regular audience by a screen, she translates the words of the pastor to these silent worshipers who are seated in the front pews. During the morning services the deaf mutes are engaged in their Bible class, for only the evening sermon is made intelligible to them. They have also been able to maintain an Endeavor meeting of their own.

One of the institutions founded by Dr. Partridge has been the Men's Club, which is kept busy with entertainments and social gatherings during the whole year. The success of this organization has been so notable that other similar ones in Pittsburg have been adopting features in its charter and methods of work. Importance is given to social problems in the discussions of the club, those that are local being given the most prominence. "Problems of the City" not only find a place in the pulpit and the men's meetings, but often form the subject at the weekly prayer service.



Fourth Ave. Baptist Church, Pittsburg

The church building gives little evidence of the varied organizations that meet within its walls. It is surrounded by business houses or the poorer class of tenements, largely occupied by foreigners. It is proposed to reach out after these people more systematically, as soon as trained assistants speaking foreign languages can be engaged.

What was once the auditorium is now the centre of the business activities of the Church. This is made attractive by a fountain, where a stream plays amid mosses and ferns. Near the door hangs a bulletin board, which not only supplements the notices on the calendar, but contains such announcements as the weekly census of contagious diseases issued by the Board of Health. A portion of the vestibule has been partitioned off for the use of the sterilized milk association which maintains a depot here. Over the desk in the fountain-room is suspended a huge imitation of a barometer, with the record of the attendance of the Sunday School. Over the pastor's study is a public reading room. A peculiarly successful department is the kindergarten, where a professional instructor has been engaged to entertain the little ones during the morning sermon. Even cribs are provided in the nursery for infants, left there by mothers who might not be able to attend the services unless such provision were made. Sunday afternoon about fifty Chinese assemble in the fountain-room for Bible instruction, each being provided with an individual teacher. An industrial school meets in the building Saturday afternoons, for the instruction in household science of children from the neighborhood. The boys' club has a drum corps, and a brigade allied with the national organization is contemplated. These are some of the original features of the department work, most of the others being what can be found in well equipped modern churches. This Church, however, refuse to accept the designation of being an institutional church, for it is really a plain, old-fashioned religious organization, which has been compelled to adopt institutional features to meet its special opportunities.

The Fourth Avenue Baptist Church has been the mother of at least ten flourishing Baptist organizations in the vicinity. Its backbone continues to be the members who ride miles from the residential districts or the suburbs, to attend the services or participate in the institutions. Dr. Partridge does not favor subordinating religious truth to current topics in his sermons. He regards religious training as his first "business," and all else must take second place.

Keeping the Children Off the Streets

BY LAWRENCE H. TASKER

IN the long evenings of fall and winter, thousands of boys and girls, young men and women, roam the streets of our great cities, seeking attraction denied them in cheerless tenement houses. Influences for evil are naturally rampant in crowded communities, and on the school authorities devolves a moral duty for the protection of the young, far outside the limits of ordinary school hours. The power employed must be moral suasion, for no truant law forces a child to go to school after three o'clock, unless he wishes to, nor has it any application at all to those above fourteen years of age.

To keep the boys and girls off the street, New York has now in operation, in school buildings, twenty-nine recreation centres. These are open from 7.30 till 10 in the evening, for six days in the week, from September till June. There is no requirement for regular attendance, the idea being to make the school activities so interesting that the pupils will desire to come. "Play, as a means of teaching," is the educational maxim involved in this work; for while the play spirit is given prominent recognition in every centre, it is made the means of bringing about the great end—development. The word "recreation," as applied to this activity, means far more than amusement. It means giving occupation to the idle, entertainment to the weary, and training by developing the body, mind and heart, thereby re-creating the boys and girls of the street, inasmuch as it gives them a desire for a newer and better life.

The Boys' Study Room in an Evening Recreation Centre

The work of the recreation centre is organized into four divisions: The reading and study room, the literary and debating clubs, quiet games and gymnastic teams. The study room is for those whose overcrowded homes make the preparation of day school tasks almost an impossibility, and is taken advantage of also by serious-minded young people who wish to prepare for Civil Service or Regent's Examinations. In this room, there are not only books of reference, but also sympathetic and helpful teachers, who are competent to give assistance on difficulties of almost every variety.

The club is the distinctive feature of the recreation centre. The boys form themselves into athletic and parliamentary clubs, reading circles and debating societies. Under the guidance of the principal of the recreation centre, they draw up constitutions and by-laws, electioneer for office, and govern themselves as strictly as any organization of adults could possibly do. These boys, who, if left to themselves, would naturally form "gangs," following their vicious leaders and learning assault, robbery, and even murder, now form clubs for peaceful and uplifting purposes, and develop a sturdy American citizenship, and are organized into Literary Circles, Debating Societies or Athletic Clubs, with constitutions and by-laws. The club director attends the meetings, but, unless appealed to for advice, takes no part in the proceedings. The secretary must keep his minutes with perfect accuracy, and so must the treasurer his accounts. The dues and fines collected are expended for gymnasium uniforms or for short excursions. In one club, the constitution directs that any boy caught smoking will be fined two cents, and any boy who disturbs the meetings will be fined three cents. The fines are collected, and turned into the club's bank account.

Every club has the use of a separate room for business meetings one evening a week, and certain hours for the use of the gymnasium, basket-ball courts, ping-pong tables, and other amusements. Each game room is supplied with an assortment of quiet games, such as chess, checkers, dominoes, authors, and a variety of geographical and historical puzzle games.

The girls show no less enthusiasm than the boys in the formation of reading circles, clubs and the like. The directors of the clubs encourage talk and criticism of the authors read, and considerable literary work of a very creditable character is done. They have also musical recitals and entertainments. Nor do the girls neglect the gymnasium, for the love of physical culture quickly fascinates them, and at any time during the hours of the session, in neat gymnasium suits (for the most part made by their own hands), they may be seen developing their bodies and making them strong and healthy. In each centre there is a traveling library, and statistics show that during the last season 73,316 books were circulated. Magazines and newspapers are also provided.

Even mothers come with their daughters to listen to the music, and to read and talk among themselves. The women often bring sewing and knitting to the club-room, and work while they listen to the piano recitals or the stories read aloud. Not all understand English, but many of those who can seek in this way to improve their knowledge of American history and literature. The fathers come also to watch the acrobatic performances of their sons, and also discuss with each other problems of every-day interest.

In these recreation centres new thoughts are stirred, new ambitions created, and dormant impulses toward higher things encouraged. The children of the slums learn to appreciate what makes for the better side of life. With new ideas and new aspirations, they become missionaries to their households. All great public institutions are striving to the one end—a healthier and more intelligent citizenship, a greater reverence for law and order, and a higher realization of the finer instincts, which, however concealed, are never hopelessly buried. Education never costs a city as much as crime.

ENGLAND'S REVIVAL GOES FORWARD

FOR a month past, Dr. Torrey and Mr. Charles Alexander have been stirring the big manufacturing city of Sheffield, England, to its centre with revival meetings, at which thousands flocked daily to hear the Word. The night meetings were held in a great military drill hall, which had been remodelled to seat 5,000 people. Soon after the campaign began, it was packed nightly, with hundreds unable to obtain admission. More than three thousand conversions were claimed during the campaign. Hundreds were won to Christ on the streets and in homes and shops and factories.

The city was captivated by Mr. Alexander's revival hymns, which echo upon its streets day and night. A gratifying feature of the revival movement is that hundreds of workmen in the factories and foundries have confessed Christ, and are working to win their fellow-workmen. One convert, it is said, led twenty-five of his comrades to the Saviour before the campaign closed.

A number of dinner-hour, open-air meetings were held for workmen at the gates of the big foundries. Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander conducted two meetings of this character, and Mr. Alexander alone held a third just outside the iron works of Vickers' Sons & Maxim, at which there was an attendance of about fifteen hundred. This gathering is shown in the photograph on the cover of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The platform upon which Mr. Alexander and his choir stood consisted of two flat-topped drays, upon which a piano had been hoisted. The street was a solid mass of people, listening reverently to the Gospel message. Following one or two revival hymns, the singing evangelist began the service with the solo, "Tell Mother I'll be There." Many hearts were moved as he sang the touching melody. As he finished, he took the song as a text for addressing the men.

In some factories and warehouses the whole tone of the establishment has been changed by the revival. In more than one shop and business house, noonday prayer and praise services are being held by little bands of converts. The genuineness of the conversions is best shown by the examples of the return of conscience money. A man employed in a large cutlery firm was recently converted, and then sent the head of the firm a money order, which, he confessed, was for the time for which he had been paid but which he had not worked. Other cases of restitution have come to light.

The lives of some of the hardest characters in Sheffield have been tranformed. Wife-beaters, gamblers and drunkards have been among the converts.

From October 8 to November 5, Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander conduct a campaign in Plymouth, where thousands of soldiers and sailors are quartered. From November 12-26, they conduct a two-weeks' campaign at Oxford. They go to Toronto in January, 1906, and thence to Philadelphia, for a three, and possibly a five, months' campaign.

The Story of Luther Burbank and his Wonderful Experiments in Plant Life

TO the great majority of readers, and especially to those who love plants d flowers, there are few books nong the thousands issued this ar that will hold such interest d attraction as New Creations in Plant Life,* which has jt come to hand from the presses of the Macmillan Co., w York. This fascinating volume deals with the life d work of Luther Burbank, whose remarkable and successful experiments in the development of many new and beautiful forms of plant life have won him a name that is now famous in two hemispheres. Many articles have been printed from time to time about the "California magician" and his surprising fruit and flower creations, but this book, by W. S. Harwood, presents the first authentic and the only really accurate story of Mr. Burbank's scientific work and discoveries.

Potatoes on Tomato Vine

Mr. Burbank, who is easily "the foremost plant breeder in world," has experimented upon more than 2,500 distct species during his work, covering a period of many ars. The result has been a great number of new and proved varieties of nuts, flowers, fruits and vegetables. om his childhood he s passionately de- ted to flowers, and nts were his pets at age when other chil- n usually chose mals. His early life s a continuous strug- to gratify his love this particular study. was only after en- ring many priva- ns, and when he was r twenty-one, that I found himself fairly rted as a nursery- n in California. His st notable commis- n was from a ranch- n who wanted 20,- 0 young prune trees out, which young rbank succeeded in ing in a remarkably ort time. That par- ular orchard is to- y one of the finest in the Golden State. In all his rk Mr. Burbank has had in view a threefold object, viz:

1. The improvement of old varieties of fruits, flowers, grasses, es and vegetables.
2. The merging of wild, or degenerate, types of plant life with tame, or cultivated ones, in order that the union may be of service to both.
3. The creation of absolutely new forms of life, unknown to the world before—the highest act of the plant-breeder.

How he has succeeded in his purpose can best be gathered from the history of some of his experiments, as Mr. Harwood tells it:

Instead of one or two experiments under way at the same time, he may have five hundred at once, all requiring constant supervision, many of them extending over a period of perhaps ten years before they come to fruition. Instead of having a few square feet of ground or a few pots under glass, he uses acres of ground, if necessary, in a single test. In place of contenting himself with a half dozen, or even fifty plants, in making a given test, he uses if necessary a million, all of them pressing forward in a million similar ways, toward the same end. And out of the million he saves perhaps in the last sifting but one, and that one the best of all.

Running through all the work is the constant effort to break up old habits of life. Mr. Burbank sees two plants of the same, or it may be widely differing, species. He sees that neither one is living up to its opportunities. For one reason or another they have been slowly going down in the scale, possibly for centuries; or else it may be they have been as slowly going upward from some poorer estate and have not had sufficient help. He knows that back of each one of these plants lies a long and varied history, full of incidents, . . . as subtle as any which come to man.

So, proceeding on these lines, he begins work with some particular plant. He studies it in all its relations; its antecedents, its present surroundings, its tendencies are all considered. Then comes the work of turning its life into new channels. The best plant of a thousand, or it may be of ten thousand, is selected for the experiment, and from this one plant the work goes on in a succession of upward selections, until the desired result is reached. It may perhaps take twenty years to produce a new flower! In breeding lilies he has used as many as 500,000 plants in a single test. Some of his most notable achievements are thus summarized:

The improved thornless and spiculess edible cactus, food for man and beast, to be the reclamation of the deserts of the world: the primus berry, a union of the raspberry and blackberry, the first recorded instance of the creation of a new species, together with the phenomenal berry created from the California dewberry and the Cuthbert raspberry, and the plumcot, the union of the plum and the apricot, all three the accomplishment of what had been said to be an impossibility: a plum with no pit, one with the flavor of a Bartlett pear, one having a rare fragrance, many plums of great value, rapidly replacing older varieties; a walnut with a shell so thin that the birds visited the branches and destroyed the nuts; a walnut bred with no tannin in its meat, the coloring matter of the skin which has a disagreeable taste; a tree which grows more rapidly than any other tree ever known in the temperate zones of the world: the Shasta daisy, a blossom five to seven inches in diameter, made out of a wild field daisy, a Japanese and an English daisy; gladioli of greatly enhanced beauty, taught to bloom around their entire stem like a hyacinth instead of the old way, on one side; a dahlia with its disagreeable odor driven out and in its place the odor of the magnolia blossom; a lily with fragrance of the Parma violet, and a scentless verbena with the intensified fragrance of the trailing arbutus; a chestnut tree which bears nuts in eighteen months from time of seed-planting; fruit trees which will withstand freezing in bud and flower; a poppy so increased in size that it measures ten inches across its brilliant bloom; an amaryllis bred up from two to three inches to nearly a foot in diameter; a calla increased in size until it measures ten to twelve inches in breadth, and then, the process being reversed, bred down to less than two inches; the white blackberry, a rare and beautiful fruit and as toothsome as beautiful; thousands of varieties of lilies. He has greatly improved the plums, pears, apples, cherries, grapes, quinces and peaches by selection and breeding; has developed many varieties of flowers, improving them in color, hardiness and yield; and has added much to the productiveness and edibility of vegetables. Pie-plant with leaves four feet in diameter, bearing every day in the year, a prune three or four times larger than the ordinary French prune and greatly enriched; the pomato, an improvement on the poisonous potato-ball, producing a rare fruit which grows upon the top of a potato; blackberries without thorns; the improved Australian star flower, one of the everlasting varieties which is to be used for the decoration of ladies' hats; a larkspur greatly enlarged in size and given a delightful odor, many improved varieties of grasses, improved tobacco;—these are among the works which have come from his hand; others promising even more important results are under way.

Concerning one experiment, the author writes:

Mr. Burbank took a wild American plum, a Japanese plum, and an apricot. He bred these three together and made a third, the plumcot, different in texture, color and taste from any other fruit. This new fruit is not only delightful to the taste but it is very interesting in its character. Sometimes the flesh will be yellow, sometimes pink, sometimes white or crimson. Sometimes it has pits like the apricot, sometimes like the plum.

As to the methods of actual work the following will be of general interest:

When the flowers of a given test are in full blossom the work of pollenation begins. For this work, when it presents only general problems, he relies almost entirely upon his finger tips. He does not recommend that an amateur so restrict himself but suggests various instruments: A pair of jeweler's forceps, or pincers, a jeweler's sieve-grass, a small but powerful microscope, a sharp knife, a saucer for heating the pollen, a soft brush for sifting or dusting the pollen from the stamen to the stigma of the plant to be fertilized. Whatever it is necessary he makes use of any or all of these, or of other devices of his own making but usually he pollenates by scraping the pollen upon a watch-crystal and placing it upon the stigma with his finger-tips. The main object is to see that the pollen from the one flower gets onto the stigma of the other flower. The fertilizing, or fructifying nature of the moment if not less than a week well.

But the reader who is sufficiently interested to begin experiments should procure the book for himself. There are doubtless many thousands of amateur and professional cultivators of flowers and fruits who will find in Mr. Burbank's exposition of his methods a practical way of solving many of the mysteries of plant life. He has opened a new and wonderful page in the book of nature.

Mr. Carnegie's "Peace League"

IT is refreshing to note the regularity with which that puissant veteran of the Peace movement, Andrew Carnegie, comes to the front and shakes up the European war-dogs in the most approved fashion. His recent address on the occasion of his installation as rector of St. Andrew's University, Scotland, foreshadows conditions for which a very large portion of the human race has long been waiting, but which, in the present state of affairs, seem still very far off. Five leading nations banding together, he held, could banish war. He suggested the formation of a League of Peace, with an open invitation to all nations to join, and an understanding that all international disputes should go to the Hague for settlement; any nation refusing to do this to be cut off from intercourse by all the others. This League, moreover, Mr. Carnegie believes, should reserve to itself the right to use force to prevent war when driven to extremes; in other words, to fight for peace when necessary.

In view of the infirmities of human nature, it is within the range of possibilities that this armed League of Peace might become, in the hands of a few ambitious rulers, the worst kind of a despotism, potential for evil on a tremendous scale. It could be dominated by the Powers having the biggest purse, the strongest armies, the largest navies. It could be made to minister to national ambitions. It could keep the weaker peoples down, and might become a standing menace to the healthful expansion and development of any growing nation. It would be a packed jury, from which there would be no appeal.

Peace by force is peace while the repression lasts and no longer. Peace by the conviction that comes of education and Christian enlightenment, together with the spread of humane principles, is the only one that need be expected to endure. We believe in the Hague Tribunal as a step in the right direction, looking to the settlement of quarrels by the sane and civilized methods of courts of law and justice. There are already some thirty nations bound as signatories to carry their disputes to that august court. If they could be persuaded to renew their pledges now, and especially if the leading nations should set the example of carrying their mutual troubles to the Hague, we believe that the powerful influence of this example would soon be felt everywhere.

Set the wheels of the Hague Court going in earnest, and there will be no need of a standing armed League to club refractory nations into submission. Recognizing the authority of this court, any or all of the leading governments would respond to its summons and aid to the utmost extent in executing its just decrees, which would be humane and reasonable and not tyrannous. To thrust aside the Hague and substitute the arbitrary authority of an armed patrol would be to ignore the teachings of history and to create a tool, which, in the hands of some Cæsar or Napoleon of the future, might be employed to crush the liberties of the world.

A Move in the Right Direction

THAT President Roosevelt, in the midst of his multiform activities, should call together a number of men conspicuous in the direction of college athletics, for the purpose of ameliorating the brutality of American football as it is now played, is an occasion for congratulation on the part of parents. To bring a lad successfully through the reefs and shoals of juvenile maladies, to see him strong and stalwart on the threshold of manhood, and to know that his career may be cut short in an instant by a kick from the nailed boot of an antagonist in a popular game, is no slight trial for a parent to face. Boys are proverbially reckless. They have a great disdain for danger. Neither man nor woman wishes to see a youth of eighteen cowardly and effeminate; but, on the other hand, fathers and mothers cannot but shrink from the thought of sons crippled and maimed at the outset of their career, or laid prematurely in the grave merely for sport. Beside the fiendish barbarity of American football to-day, the tortures of an Indian war-dance pale. The descriptions of the game waged early in October, on a bright Saturday afternoon, at the American League Park, New York, between Columbia University and Wesleyan, are revolting in the extreme. The young men engaged on either side apparently lost sight of the ball as an objective point, and simply pounded one another, fought like wild beasts, and raged until the police were compelled to interfere to stop what had turned into a free fight. Within a few days, in Pennsylvania and Virginia, young men have been fatally injured on the football field. Is it worth while thus to waste life, thus to sacrifice our sons on the altar of vanity, thus to stain our national reputation for fair play and good sense?

The arguments in favor of football have been often repeated. We are told that the game develops keenness of vision, swiftness of decision, alertness, obedience, courage, strength, and skill. While in training, the members of a football team live according to hygienic rules, refrain from smoking and from other excesses, and keep themselves in fine physical condition. This is well so far as it goes, but of what avail is splendid physique, if the only end in view is to maul and batter it until ribs are broken, teeth knocked out, and faces disfigured for life. The natural limit of football playing is reached in early youth. It is a boy's and not a man's game. It has for boys, beyond the fierce delight they find in battle, the additional joy that it is played in the presence of many spectators whose cheers delight the victors and add to the grief of the vanquished. But its handicaps may continue long after youth has waned.

If the game were played on lines of fairness, were made simply an athletic contest and the element of brutality were eliminated, no reasonable person would entertain an objection to it. As it is, the thing shocks every disinterested critic, and is a palpable outrage. We cannot be too thankful that President Roosevelt, who is foremost in so many good works, has turned his attention to the possible improvement of football.

Welcome to the Penitent

LETTERS received at this office from many correspondents seem to imply a misconception of an important doctrine, which may have troubled others, and which ought to be removed. It is the idea, derived from several passages of Scripture, wrongly understood, that the Christian who falls into sin is cut off from all hope of pardon. Words cannot describe the sorrow, in many cases tending to despair, that results from this conviction. It paralyzes the very feeling that ought to be encouraged, and leads, through very hopelessness, to continuance in sin.

The sorrow that is felt is right and reasonable. It is a most deplorable thing for one who has been accepted as a child of God to return to his sins. It brings reproach on the name of Christ, and is an evidence of ingratitude and wickedness far greater than the wrongdoing of the unconverted. Self-reproach and sincere repentance there should be, but it should not be sorrow without hope. It is a reflection on the character of God to assume that he will not forgive his erring child. Again and again he assures the backslider, in his Word, that if he will repent and return, he will be welcomed and reinstated. He goes even further, and in exceeding kindness and delicacy, declares that "None of his sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him." The only conditions required of the backslider are, that he sincerely repent and renounce his sin.

The aspect of God's character which Jesus made most prominent, was that of his fatherhood. We ought to draw encouraging inferences from that idea of him. The human father dealing with his naughty child does not repudiate him or cut him off from his love. Rather he sorrows with the penitent, deplores his wrong-doing and welcomes him back to his heart. It is a joy to him when he sees his child grieving over his fault and turning to him for pardon. Is God less kind, less magnanimous? Did David and Peter find him obdurate? Their fall seems to be recorded for the direct purpose of encouraging the backslider to return.

Let no Christian who has committed sin, however grievous, hesitate about his duty. Let him instantly and resolutely put away his sin, and in humility and penitence go to God with his confession, and entreat pardon for Christ's sake. To remain away in sullen despair, to continue his sin in hopelessness of its being forgiven, is to aggravate the evil and to make restoration impossible. As the father of the prodigal receiv[ed] him and rejoiced over his return, so will the Heave[nly] Father accord the penitent believer a hearty welco[me] and restore him to his favor.

Look on the Bright Side

SEVERAL of our contemporaries have lately gi[ven] prominence to the predictions of a leading capit[al]ist and employer of labor, foreshadowing gloomy ti[mes] ahead for the working classes. He is credited with [the] statement that, while the number of the unemployed [at] the present time is between two and three millions, in 1[907] and 1908 it will reach the startling figure of from 7,0[00,]000 to 10,000,000. This, he holds, will be the natu[ral] outcome of our increasing overproduction in all lines.

Fortunately, there are few who share these gloo[my] and pessimistic forebodings. Deep down in the he[art] of the American people there is a firm conviction t[hat] God is overruling the destinies of this nation for go[od]. His hand has been visible in its development from [the] beginning, and He has made it his chosen instrum[ent] for the accomplishment of great purposes. Ours is [a] advancing, not a retrograding Republic. The love [of] law and order increases. Education is enlighten[ing] the minds of the masses and liberating them from [the] darkest of all thraldoms—themselves. Every suc[ces]sive generation is more alive than its predecessors w[ith] to the fact that there is a reasonable and legitim[ate] means of redressing public evils, and of readjusting [ab]normal economic conditions by the peaceful method[s of] legislation. The great truth that all power resides [in] the people is permeating all classes of society, from [the] mansions of the rich to the cottage or tenement of [the] poorest worker.

Nothing is to be gained by pessimism or by spreading the Gospel of discontent in this free and favored la[nd], which is to-day, in many respects, the most ric[h] blessed of any on earth. What we need is not croak[ers] and prophets of disaster, but more faith in God [and] confidence in ourselves. Instead of finding occas[ion] for gloom, we have, as a people, a thousand causes [for] thankfulness. He is a poor American, indeed, and [un]worthy to be a son of the Republic who, on look[ing] around him, cannot see abundant reasons for banish[ing] discontent and taking courage. Even the feve[rish] scramble for mere wealth will moderate, after a wh[ile], as men learn the lesson of the penalties and resp[on]sibilities that attach to great riches. Each clas[s is] learning its lesson, and the experience will leave us [all] better and wiser. Let us look on the bright side, [do] our duty and trust in God for the rest.

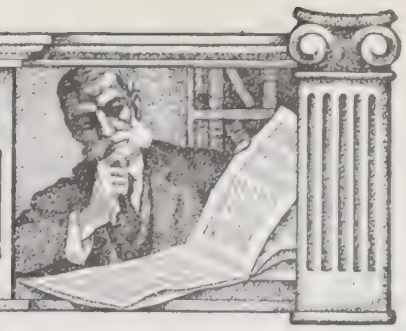
The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER



Development in the East

ONE of the first-fruits of the new agreement between Great Britain and Japan is the raising of Singapore to the position of a naval base. The settlement has long been regarded as an

The island of Singapore is out twenty-seven miles long by urteen broad, and is separated om the peninsula by a narrow annel. It has extensive fortifica- ns placed on a number of small ands surrounding it, which shel- r and protect the harbor. Real- ng the importance of the position, d desiring to have the power of tively aiding Japan, in the event that power being assailed by any her nation, Great Britain has now quired possession of the Tanjong gar Docks, which will afford an- orage for a large fleet and give cilities for repairs and refitting ships. By this means the glish Government is affording portunities for the convenience of ships of all nations in nes of peace, and has increased its power of control- g the movements of a fleet in time of war. It is obable that the new acquisition will aid materially in e development of commerce, and in the security of ose interests which the treaty between England and pan is intended to promote. As in the days of the cient prophet, all nations will welcome an enterprise om which all will derive benefit.

The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market: and thou ast replenished and made very glorious in the midst of the as. (Ezek. 27: 25.)

King's Farewell

There was a very pathetic scene in the Swedish Parliament last week, when King Oscar announced the final ssolution of the union between Sweden and Norway. a voice broken by emotion, and with eyes suffused th tears, he bade farewell to the half of his kingdom. e said: "It is at a fateful moment that I raise my oice in this hall. The union formed in 1814 between e people of the Scandinavian Peninsula, disunited for nturies before, is ruptured, and the Swedish Riksdag as approved my proposal in regard to its dissolution. It is truly not without deep grief that I see these two closely related peoples again separated. However, I do not give up the hope that, though political union no longer exists, lasting peace between the two peoples may be maintained in the future to the safety and happiness of both nations." It may be hoped that the king's prognostication will be fulfilled. Possibly each nation may go forward in its own way, with less friction separately than united.

Can two walk together unless they be agreed? (Amos 3: 3).

Palestine for the Jews

At a meeting held last week, in New York, to receive the delegates who had been sent to the Zionist Conference at Basle, a hopeful spirit was manifested. The delegates declared that the reports of disorder published in American journals were greatly exaggerated. The meetings were orderly, the discussions friendly, though earnest, and the interest intense. The delegates said that the Conference had been prolific of results. "The resolutions settling for all time the desire of the Jews the world over for a legally assured, universally recognized home for the Jewish people in Palestine, were passed by an overwhelming majority. The Congress declared definitely for the securing of political reforms in Palestine which would lead ultimately to administrative autonomy. Committees were appointed looking to the development of industries and of the present Jewish colonies in Palestine." It was impossible, said one of the speakers for the Jews, to make a permanent home under their own government, and under their own flag, in any other region than that hallowed by ancient associations and divine gift. That was the reason why the liberality of the British offer of a settlement in Africa was not accepted.

The Lord will have mercy on Jacob, and will yet choose Israel and set them in their own land (Isa. 14: 1).

The Tanjong Pagar Docks in Singapore, Recently Acquired by Great Britain

An Ancient Cemetery

An extraordinary discovery was made recently on the Arkansas river in Indian Territory. An educated Indian of the Creek tribe has a farm in that section. In the course of draining operations, he came upon some human bones, and proceeding farther, he found that at intervals of every four feet, there was another skeleton. He was interested in the discovery, and informed a local editor of it, who reported it to the Ethnological Department at Washington, D. C. An investigation was made, with the result that the largest pre-historic burial-ground on this continent has been laid open. It extends for two miles parallel with the river, the graves being in regular order, and at equal distances. Each body was laid facing the East, and in exactly the same position. Under the right arm in every case was an earthen bowl, but why it was placed there cannot now be conjectured. In one instance only, the grave of a man who must have been seven feet tall, was there a warlike weapon. This was a spearhead nine inches long. The fact that there was no bones of women among them, leads the archæologists to the opinion that the dead had been slain in battle. All suggestions, however, are mere conjecture. The graves were covered with a layer of adobe, on the top of which was a loam, in which gigantic forests grew, some of the trees being five feet in diameter. The race must have lived at a vast distance of time, and no record remains of them but these crumbling skeletons.

Remember the days of old; consider the years of many generations (Deut. 32:7).

His Own Victim

A sad accident occurred a few days ago in the freight yard of the New York Central Railroad. The superintendent of the make-up of the trains was in the yard, arranging the duties of the engineers of the switching engines and directing their movements, when he stepped in front of one that he had forgotten. His back was turned to the approaching locomotive, but so close was he to it, that the engineer could not stop in time to save him. It passed over him, killing him instantly. When the engineer was examined after the accident, he proved that he was obeying the orders given by the superintendent himself, who must have known that the engine would pass over the tracks between which he stepped. He could only suppose that, in the multiplicity of duties, he must have overlooked that particular detail, which he had explicitly directed. It was a sad oversight in a man whose duties required the utmost caution in the presence of constant danger. The penalty the unfortunate man paid was the loss of his life. Unhappily there are many who suffer the loss of their souls, through similar heedlessness, in not realizing the result of connections which they have themselves established, in spite of the warnings of God's Word.

He that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; they that hate me love death (Prov. 8: 36).

A Lost Heir Found

For some time past search has been going on here and in Europe for the heir to a large English estate. He disappeared from his ancestral home twelve years ago, saying he would never return. His father had refused permission to his marrying the girl of his choice, on the ground that she was below the rank of the family. Nothing was heard from him, and it was not known in what quarter of the world he had settled. The death of his father made it necessary to find him, and agents were employed all over the world in the search. One of these was a lawyer in Brooklyn, who has succeeded in tracing him. He found the young man in the Hospital for Contagious Diseases on North Brother Island, where he was employed as an orderly. He has borne great hardships during the twelve years of his exile. When he first came to America he was unable to find employment. Though a university man and a scholar, he was at last glad to earn his livelihood by driving an express wagon. Then he became a motorman, and finally served in his present position in the hospital. He is now returning to his own country to assume his rank and station among his old friends. It is not with him as with a multitude to whom the offer of an inheritance in God's kingdom is made. He does not ignore it or slight it, but gladly goes to take possession.

I commend you to God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance (Acts 20: 32).

BEARERS OF GOD'S GOLD

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

"Such as lay in wait by the way"

IT is March 12, B. C., 458, and fifteen hundred Jewish exiles have gathered beside the Canal Ahava, to the north of Babylon. They have brought with them all of their belongings, packed upon the backs of camels and asses. Evidently they are about to start on a long journey. Their leader is Ezra, a highly esteemed teacher of the law, and a patriot of patriots. His noble character and his culture have won for him the favor of the Persian King, Artaxerxes. And so he comes to the place of rendezvous, richly laden with gifts from the king's treasury, of gold and silver, beside twenty basins of gold and two basins of fine copper. The people assembled at the Canal Ahava, are there of their own free will, because they desire to return to their own land, and have been given permission by the king to do so.

Ezra is not in haste to have the caravan start. He gives command to the people to set up their tents, and prepare to spend three days in fasting and prayer, that they may gain the help of God on the long journey. He tells them that a caravan so heavily laden with treasure, will be a mark for the robbers, and that he has refrained from asking a guard of soldiers from the king, lest it should seem that they did not trust the Lord their God. Wise leader that he is, Ezra passes around among his people to count and classify them, giving to each group their special duties by the way. He misses one class of people, the Levites, to whom should be given the care of the gold and silver, the gift of the king, as it is intended for use in God's Temple, and not for Ezra himself. And so Ezra sends back to Babylon for Levites to come and join the caravan. Thirty Levites come, and bring with them two hundred and twenty servants, who were called "Nethinim."

Their numbers being complete, the assembled multitude waits upon the Lord in earnest prayer. They are led by Ezra, who strengthens them in prayer by reading the promises of God from God's own Book, the Bible. Day after day of the happy journey passes. Ezra improving every possible time for prayer, and for instructing the people in the Word of God. At last they reach Jerusalem safely, having met with no detention or molestation from robbers by the way, because the Lord was their helper. They find a glad welcome from the descendants of the Jews, who, seventy-six years before, had left Babylon to return to Jerusalem. Ezra enjoins three days of rest and prayer, as at the beginning of their journey, before they shall enter upon their home-making. Their tents are set up in Jerusalem, their cherished goal, and they rest in God with thanksgiving and praise.

Illustration and Application

The journey from the Babylonish captivity to the "holy city" may fitly represent the Christian life, and especially the Christian's stewardship of property, which is truly given us by the Great King in trust, not to use selfishly, but to be handled honestly and generously, and accounted for to him at the end of the journey. Such a lesson is very timely, when the misuse of even trust funds is being exposed in our land as never before.

1. Gold given by the King. It is strange, indeed, that property should prompt pride. "What hast thou that thou didst not receive?" Ezra was a millionaire more than twice over, but he did not forget that the money was given him by the king to be used for divine service. Nor did the thirty Levites and their 220 servants, who carried the money for months, forget that it was really God's gold, and that they held it as a sacred trust. The Bible doctrine, which is becoming the people's doctrine also, is that millionaires are not owners, but stewards and trustees under God, for their fellow-men, of the wealth which, only in small part, can they, in any sense, claim to have earned, but which has come to them through the labors of a multitude of predecessors and contemporaries, and often in large part, like Ezra's gold, from the government through franchises and charters and tariffs. If millionaires are God's stewards, like Ezra, those who have less of his gold, like the Levites and servants, are also his stewards.

Who made the gold? And the silver? And the mines of copper, and coal, and iron? Not a vegetable or animal can grow without God. Every kind of "raw material" comes from him. Man's real ownership is only in his "improvements." He is, therefore, a partner with God, and should hold God's share in the property, at least as a trustee for all the Father's household. A scarlet thread runs through all the ropes used in the British Navy, to protect it against thieves, and guarantees its reliability for the stress and storm. So, through all our property we should see the scarlet thread of its divine origin. Let the gold remind us of its Creator's glory, the silver of his purity; the growing wheat of his everpresent power; the evergreen pines of his everlastingness. Over and over again the child should be taught to trace back his bread to its source; from mother to baker, from baker to miller, from miller to farmer, from farmer to ground, from ground to God. So the penny leads back in succession to mother and mint and mine and maker. Dr. C. S. Robinson gives the following illustration of our stewardship under God in the handling of property: "Picture yourself passing the gateway of two beautiful estates. You overhear the conversation of the two sleek stewards who manage them. One of them asks of the other, with an anxiety which shows he is becoming perplexed: 'How will you pay up the revenues this season?' And the other quietly replies: 'Oh, I shall not be able to give my proprietor anything this year. I have generally been pretty liberal, but I have laid out so much on other things already that really I cannot afford to pay owner's dues!' And the first, much relieved, continues: 'And so have I. I always plan in the spring for this and that and the other; this year I cannot even allow for my Lord!' Thus the wise old stewards talk and talk big words, as if they really imagined they were property men."

"The river that runneth to Ahava"

2. Gold Carried Safely Through Perils. The only danger Ezra saw in carrying millions of money on a four months journey was from outside robbers. It was a miracle that this peril was escaped. If two hundred and fifty people in these days of mad haste to be rich had two millions of money in charge for four months it would be a "miracle" if some of them di not "embezzle" it. The selfish human hea is the den whence two robbers of God an man emerge. Dishonesty and Greed. Ho mean and foolish is dishonesty! It is almo sure to be found out and punished, not alo or chiefly by imprisonment, but by dishon to the guilty and unspeakable shame ar sorrow to his family and friends.

In a certain town in New York State bank cashier had used for his own purpo the bank's money, had been detected, ar sent to prison for a long term of years. H had a beautiful little daughter. A few da after his trial and sentence this sweet chi came home from school sobbing as thoug her heart would break. "Oh, mother, she cried, "I am never, never going back that school again. Send for my books. Her mother, thinking it was some childi whim, tried to reason with her. "No," s persisted, "I am never going back, for o of the girls called my father a thief." H tender heart was wounded just as though had been stabbed with a dagger. H mother removed her from the school, b the wound was fatal. The child sicken and pined. Her mother summoned the physician. The physician could do nothin He said, "I can't heal a wounded heart. The frail blossom faded until she could n stand, and was slowly dying. She begg them to send for her father. By the use powerful influence he was permitted to g under the charge of a warden, to see h dying child.

When he reached the death chamber his little daught looked up with a serene smile wreathing her wan fa as she said, "Father, I knew you would come. No lay your head down beside mine on the pillow as y used to do." The strong man, broken-hearted, laid h head beside the child's. She patted him lovingly on t cheek, and her spirit took its flight to be with God. K led by shame! It would seem to be enough to keep a man from dishonesty, to think that in such a case would himself be compelled to see a thief every time looked in the glass. Every book or show that mak robbery seem heroic should be shut out by fathers a "city fathers" as if it were the plague. And let bo already infected be shown how mean is the man w never earns an honest dollar himself but lives by shootin down those who have, and taking their earnings by vi lence or by fraud, for the support of his own lazy life.

But the miser is almost as b as the thief. The stingy m who earns money only for hi self is first cousin to the pic pocket. He cheats himself mo of all by shutting up his hand hold God-given gold instead opening his hand in glad benev lence. There is dew in one flo er and not in another, becau one opens itself and takes while the other closes itself a the drops run off. Who ev saw a happy miser? But ma have learned in open-hand generosity that it literally "more blessed to give than receive."

The following true anecdote related of a man who went hear a minister discourse on t subject of money. He cared b little about religion, but w much concerned about gettin money, and had laid by consi erable wealth. The minist said he would consider mon under three topics of though The first was, "Get all you can. He spoke of having a purpose life and of providing things ho est in the sight of all men. T man's attention was at once s cured, and he nudged his neighbor and said, "I nev heard such preaching before. This is very good. Th minister knows something; it is admirable preaching. The minister went on to speak of activity and of industry and announced his second thought, which was, "Save a you can." The man became excited. "Was there ev anything like this?" he said. The minister denounce thriftlessness and waste, and satirized the wilful wicke ness which lavishes in luxury; and the man rubbed h hands in satisfaction. But the minister's last topic wa "Give all you can." "There" said the man, "he h gone and spoiled the whole sermon."

A Christian gentleman who was noted for his liber gifts to the cause of foreign missions was met one day b a wealthy irreligious gentleman, who censured him f giving so profusely to foreign missions, while the po were unemployed and starving all around him. The goo man answered: "I will give $250 to the poor of this city if you will do the same." The ungenerous critic quick responded: "I did not mean that, but if you must g from home, why go so far away."

In his Preface to this Charming Volume, Dr. Banks says:

"BIOGRAPHY, where the real personality is revealed, is ever the most entertaining and instructive of all literature. This is a book of biography at magnetic points. It is full of the warm, red blood of very live men and women.

"It has been the purpose of the author to gather in this volume such stories of love, heroism, and adventurous daring, together with lighter incident, as would make the personalities of the people discussed, alive and real to the reader. More than half of those whose names are disclosed in this table of contents are yet living among us, and the rest still live in these stories of a vital personal career which make them immortal.

"The author has not attempted, in compiling this volume, to make it exhaustive. Another volume might be made like it, with different names, and another, and another, so rich is American history and American life in strong and vigorous and heroic personality. But he has sought to give the reader a rich mine of striking, virile stories of picturesque interest and variety, into which it would always be a pleasure to delve, either for entertainment, or to find golden nuggets for use.

* * *

"Whatever may be the judgment of the readers as to the wisdom of the selections, in the midst of such embarrassment of resources, the author feels that the book will at least have one great merit—it will be interesting, and no one will be able to spend an hour with it without his wits being brightened, and his heart stirred by communion with genuine and attractive people."

A THREEFOLD CORD

The Story of a Trio of Twentieth Century Girls

BY AGNES DUNCAN

CHAPTER I.—CHANGES

JOHN HARMON, usually the most even-tempered of men, became so irritable and difficult by degrees, that at home and in business he was voted a crank. Nobody understood his being both cross and melancholy, and nobody suspected at first that he was almost at the breaking point. One morning he fainted at the breakfast table. Then, too, he had persistent insomnia. The sleepless nights were fast wearing him out. Something had to be done. What should it be? Family councils were in order.

It was decided, after several consultations, that the family style of living must be changed, for a while at least, and the girls find something to do. Once in a while, after a long course of tranquillity in household life, it happens that change comes suddenly, or a cloud gathers on the horizon without any warning. There have been unnoticed ones of course, but they have not been sufficiently pronounced to cause alarm. Thus the Harmons were thoroughly unprepared for their father's serious breakdown in health. When the doctor looked grave, and said he would like another opinion, mother and the girls were frightened, and something like consternation settled down on the house.

That night Anne and Priscilla lay awake talking for a long time, and after midnight Peggy, the practical elder sister, crept softly in with the intention of quieting them and bidding them go to sleep. Instead, she lit a candle and set it in a shadowy corner, and then, perched on the foot of the bed, she too joined the low-toned council. It was unprecedented that anything should be the matter with father. In the eyes of his daughters he was like the great oak tree that stood just in front of the garden gate, in storm and sunshine, the emblem of magnificent strength.

If it had been mother they could have understood that she might be in danger. For mother was a fragile little being, like a flower at the old oak's root, and it had been everybody's first concern to shield and protect her, so long as the girls could remember.

There was anxious waiting for the verdict of the specialist. When it came, it made necessary an entire revolution in the household managing. Father was to drop all business, all worry, all work, all care, for an indefinite period. He was to go somewhere away from home, across the continent or across the ocean, the doctors said it made little difference which, so that he might be absent and distant from home and the office. Climate? That really was of less consequence than one would think. The chief necessity was to put the barrier of remoteness between an overworked and wornout man, and the scene of his life-long activity. Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, or Italy, the doctors did not positively say which place it should be; but they ordered him from home. If John Harmon could not sleep, he would either die or become insane. Sleep he must have. His nervous energy had given out. It must be reinforced. Meanwhile, the girls would have to put their young shoulders to the wheel. John Harmon, boy and man, had been an unremitting toiler indoors, over a ledger, and he was now fifty, bald-headed and withered. The springs of vitality had grown dry during the years which he had spent in the shipping office, where he had occupied every post from that of errand boy to head bookkeeper, Like Tim Lincolnwater, John had always scorned vacations. They had bored him. It had been satisfaction enough to gravitate like a pendulum between his office, where everything was in the most beautiful order, and the home, which, under his wife's management, was a dream of comfort. She and the girls had never been denied their summer outings. The girls had been finely educated, and they moved without question in the best society of the city where they lived. It was a thriving town of perhaps a hundred thousand inhabitants, a seacoast town, which was bound in time to grow to greater wealth and prominence than it had yet secured.

The Harmons were one of the old families, who surveyed with a certain condescension the new-comers, who, from time to time, took up their abode in the precincts of the rapidly increasing city. Mr. and Mrs. Harmon were both simple people, with simple tastes, but their daughters had adopted other standards, and, almost unconsciously, had learned to look upon life from a viewpoint quite other than that of their parents. Peggy was the rector's unofficial assistant, a sort of female curate. She visited the sick and the poor, giving advice to these and carrying delicacies to those, often with an air of condescension which they resented. Priscilla had artistic leanings and had been studying the art of painting miniatures. Anne, who was more like her father than either of her sisters, had been begging for a year or two that she might take a kindergarten course and prepare herself to teach. Her sisters' opposition had prevented this from being carried out.

The family had lived very closely up to their means, and latterly had gone somewhat beyond them. This complicated the situation. If father and mother should go away, the girls must manage to support themselves and keep up the home until their return. Obviously, the thing to do was to hurry the parents off. The girls never forgot that strange week, when father, for the first time in their experience, stayed at home, and seemed dazed, as if he had been an uninterested spectator, while others managed his affairs. Mother, who had been helpless and gently passive until now, took the helm in hands that did not tremble. She was resolute in making father obey the doctors, an underlying resolution that nobody had suspected having come to the surface.

"How long shall you stay abroad?" asked Peggy, for the scale had tipped in favor of Europe, and passage in a slow Transatlantic steamer had been taken for two.

"I shall stay until I bring John home a well man."

"And what do you think we had better do, mother!"

"I don't know, my dears. There is money enough in the bank for six months' rent. Keep Norah if you can. If you can't see your way to pay her, let her go, and do your own work. I did it all when you were babies."

"Mother!"

"Indeed I did. I never kept help until Anne was three, and I had that long illness. Peggy was six then and Priscilla four and a-half. Norah has been with us ever since. I should hate to turn her adrift; but you girls must earn money for yourselves. Other girls do; you can. Only don't bother me, and write cheerfully to father."

"Are you taking money enough?" asked Peggy, with solicitude.

"Plenty for the first year," answered mother, putting the last things into the steamer trunk.

October nights were crisp and cold. October sunshine was warm and golden. The steamer sailed very early on a Saturday morning, and passengers went on board Friday evening. The three girls saw their parents comfortably ensconced in their stateroom, kissed them good-bye, and went home, more downhearted and disconsolate than they had ever been in their lives, but yet, feeling all at once, older, more responsible, and more fitted to cope with fate.

Norah had lighted a fire of pine knots, and the warmth and glow of the blaze were very welcome. The neighbors who had gone with them to the pier came in and lingered awhile, everybody trying to be as consoling as possible. One friend, who had crossed forty times, assured them that the Atlantic was nothing but a rather long ferry, and another declared that he had been worse off than their father when he had had to go to the East, to Egypt and the Holy Land, you know, and "look at me now," he finished triumphantly.

"We would better all go home," said the rector's wife, "and let these children go to bed."

At breakfast that Saturday morning it was hard for them to realize that the Saracen was already well on her way, and the house seemed strangely vacant and empty, just as if there had been a death, and they had come home from the funeral, with the difference that here there was the far-off hope, twinkling like a tiny star, of the wanderers' return at last, while, so far as this earthly life is involved, the grave makes a final end.

"I am going down town," said Peggy, "to insert an advertisement in the Evening Despatch. I have consulted Norah, and she is willing."

"Consulted Norah! What do you mean?" said Anne.

"Simply this, you darling innocent, that my little plan cannot well be carried out without Norah's help, as it will add to her labors. I assure you I dreaded to speak to her on the subject, but she is a jewel. She said: 'Miss Peggy, bless your heart; 'tis the very thing I'd thought of meself, and it's me that'll see it carried through. Herself and Mr. Harmon would approve of it, I'm sure, but yez would as well not be spakin' of it in a letter, till we see how it'll turn out.'"

This was Peggy's advertisement:

"Board and lodging and the comforts of a refined home can be had by a gentleman and his wife, or by two elderly ladies, on application to Box 80, Edgetown Post Office. References exchanged."

"Why two elderly ladies?" inquired Priscilla. "They are apt to be horrid, hard to please, and perfect frumps. Anyway, Peggy, if you could think of anything else it would be better than having outsiders in our home. We shall certainly lose caste, and what do we know about taking boarders?"

"The only thing I know how to do," replied Peggy with firmness, "is to keep house. It is really my only talent. The money the boarders will pay will keep the table and meet Norah's wages. I would prefer a married couple, but two elderly ladies who are rich will do as well. Poverty, alas! cannot be sheltered under this roof just at present. You ask why I said elderly rather than young? Because we are mere girls and we must have somebody for ballast in the establishment."

"You don't know the alphabet of pleasing boarders."

"I'll study it," said Peggy, stoutly.

"What rooms shall you offer? Not mother's?" Priscilla's voice was quivering.

"The whole second floor," replied Peggy. "Mother's room and the up-stairs sitting room, and father's den, with the privilege of the bath-room, of course."

"Well," said Priscilla, falling into open weeping, "it's good-bye to our home and its sweetness and retirement. Oh, Peggy, Peggy, Peggy!"

"Nonsense, my dear; brighten up a bit. When you succeed in getting a lot of orders for your miniatures maybe it won't be so needful. It's needful now, and it's got to be done, and crying won't help us."

Off she started, walking briskly, to insert her advertisement—her brave challenge to circumstances to do their worst; they should not conquer her.

Half way to the business district he met Walter Prescott, who lifted his hat joyously and joined her. They were great friends, and Peggy told him her errand. He cheered her by his hearty and unstinted sympathy and his assurance that people would fall over one another in their haste to secure such home as she could offer.

"Be sure you ask a high price, Peggy," he said, "and don't take any one who is not willing and able to pay it. Run in your way back and talk it over with Mater. She is a good adviser."

Peggy promised. She felt in need of counsel, and knew that Walter's mother could give it wisely.

Peggy had not been gone very long when Anne, in jacket, short skirt and hat, slipped out of the house, and followed her example in turning toward the business district. To her, as to her sister, it was unfamiliar ground. The main street, where the department stores were situated, was oftener the promenade for young ladies, and as a patron she had many a time lingered over the chiffons she bought, while discussing this or that affair with girls she knew who were employed as saleswomen. Some of them had been Anne's schoolmates. Others she knew in church, or in the choir, or as daughters of friends and neighbors. Now, Anne had silently resolved to become one of the vast army of bread-winning women, and her present desire was somehow to take the first step.

She went directly to the office where her father had so long been employed, and asked to see the head of the firm. Very seldom indeed had Anne Harmon ever entered this old warehouse, which, on the outside, wore a forbidding grimness like an old fortress. Dusty, dark, and cobwebby as to externals, within it was unprepossessing. Through barrels, hogsheads, and boxes Anne threaded her way, until she arrived at the offices, separated from the rest of the floor by glass partitions the lower part of which were painted white. There was still an inner office, with "Private" on the door. Into this Anne was ushered.

A gray-haired man turning in his chair saw her, smiled encouragingly, and rising, said: "Hello, Miss Anne; come right in."

CHAPTER II.—MR. GUTHRIE'S VISITOR

ANNE made a pretty picture as she stood in the doorway a second or two before advancing to meet Mr. Guthrie, who cordially shook her hand, her slight fingers like crushed rose leaves in his large grasp. He was a Scotchman, tall, spare and keen-eyed, with the shrewdness of his nation and their pawky cleverness, and back of that there was a good deal of their tender sentiment, that flows on like a stream kept warm and living under a coating of ice.

"Well, my child," he said, "what can I do for you?"

He had known her all her life, but his passing reflection was that he had not known how pretty she had grown. Her eyes were brown, with dark sweeping lashes, her cheeks a sea-shell pink, her hair a golden, deepening to red. She was a little, slender thing, but she looked womanly and capable.

"Anne and my Janet must be the same age," thought Mr. Guthrie, "but Janet's a baby beside her. I wonder what she wants?"

He did not wonder very long. To this question, "What can I do for you?" Anne replied:

"Mr. Guthrie, has any one taken my father's place?"

"No one has permanently taken it, Anne. The position will be held for him until his return. Temporarily, Mr. Wolff is his substitute."

"That has made a change all along the line, no doubt. Is there not a vacancy among your accountants, perhaps down, at the very bottom? Won't you be

A Family of Desirable Immigrants Who Were Admitted.

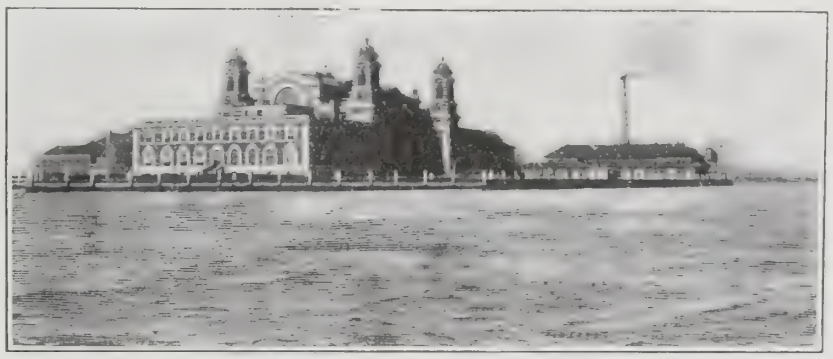
Undesirable Immigrants, Who Were Sent Back

Good and Bad Immigrants at our Gates

ELLIS ISLAND, the gateway through which millions of immigrants gain the mainland of America, has been transformed from a barren, forbidding, rocky piece of ground, into a series f well-ordered, beautifully kept lawns, from which rise stately red and white administration buildings.

The biggest of these contains at once sometimes a ırprisingly large number and variety f nationalities. Fair-haired Scandiavians jostle dark-browed Italians; ıe old Russian patriarch, with his owing, venerable beard, gazes mildly nd inquiringly about, with a timid litıe bewigged woman shrinking at his lbow. Brigandish-looking young felows, hard-featured and curly-haired, wagger about as if they owned the lace. Hearts are touched by the pahos of meetings between those who ave been long separated. Mothers nd fathers are greeted affectionately y sons and daughters already Amerıanized, as far as clothing goes, at any ate. A husband who has worked long nd hard, and having at last saved nough to send for wife and babies, lasps first one and then another, almost veeping in his joy, as he holds the wife t arms' length, the better to view her beloved feaures, while she holds toward him, with love and pride eaming from her eyes, the little two-year-old, who, it nay be, looks into his father's face for the first time. One can easily imagine the preparations that have een made for the advent of this family in the poor ittle home over on the East Side.

Then, in contrast to this bit of brightness illuming the faces of these children of sunny Italy, is the Dutch and German type of immigrant. Here comes the Herr and his square-shouldered, honest-faced Frau, followed by their numerous progeny, from the oldest girl, almost a replica of her mother, down the human line to the shy little boykin of four or five. They are a family for the coming of which our country is the richer. They are bound for the "Prairie States," and when that long line of sturdy boys grows to manhood there will be a farm "well tilled," and probably a wife "well willed," for every boy, not to mention more long lines of good Americans.



"The Gateway of Nations," Ellis Island

Over there in a corner of the Detention Room sits a group so remarkable that one hastens to inquire who they are, and why they are detained. From the grandmother, down to the fat little fellow in the youngest mother's arms, they can best be described by the one word, picturesque. The women are handsome in a bold way, while the men—well, one would be pardoned for not wishing to be at their mercy anywhere. They are Servian gypsies, and are to be sent back to their native country because they give no satisfactory explanation of why they left the Old World, or what they intended doing in the New. They were a "bad lot," and as such the gates were closed against them. By their own admissions to the inspector, there was no sort of even primitive, savage morality among them, and upon certain questions, the mothers were no wiser than the proverbial child of whom the proverb speaks. So the door to America was closed to these unwelcome immigrants. The watchdog of the port growled, and bid them begone.

As the visitors return to the boat, they see a long procession of men, women and children, who, while carrying great bags and heavy bundles, yet watch with anxious eyes the trucks trundled aboard the boat, for those sacks, chests and queer old-world boxes contain all their worldly possessions. Once on board, the newcomers seat themselves beside the friends who have come to meet them, and chatter in many tongues. The great city is at last reached, and the daily immigrant influx is soon swallowed up among its busy multitudes.

o support a Chinese evangelist. We ıave some much higher in Shanghai. I desire to place before the people in America, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, some of our needs in China. If any heart is touched to respond, ɜend the answer to Dr. Klopsch, the proprietor." Mrs. Woodberry's address is No. 18 Yangtze poo Road, Shanghai, China.

Still another faithful American missionary, Rev. Z. C. Beals, writes from Wuhu, China, giving an interesting account of the work accomplished on the mission boat, toward the support of which a number of our readers have contributed. He writes:

"Many years ago the missionaries introduced in their schools a system modeled upon Western ideas, but they had uphill work, and, although the schools were free, only a very few scholars were induced to attend. The year before the Boxer outbreak a famous edict went forth from the Emperor, written by Kang Yu Wei, proclaiming that all the temples needed for the purpose were to be fitted up into schools for Western learning. It also decreed that no one could take a degree unless he could pass an examination in Western sciences. The terrible Boxer outbreak put a stop to this movement, but after the country had settled down, and the Empress Dowager had new advisers about her, a different order of things followed. A proclamation went forth to all governors, Fu-tai's and mayors, that new schoolhouses were to be built and conducted on Western methods.

"An interesting school is situated in Han-Shan, a city forty miles from Wuhu. The mayor of this place was educated in Shanghai, and takes a great interest in foreign educational work. His brother is principal. When I visited Han-Shan, the mayor himself showed me around the school building. I took a photograph of the mayor, with the teachers and scholars, as they sat in the entrance of the school. This city of Han-Shan we missionaries have occupied for twelve years as an out-station, and the teaching of God's Word has brought forth good results."

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

Mrs. J. D., Milwaukee, Wis. 1. Until what date will signatures to the Women's Memorial for the removal of Senator Smoot, the Mormon apostle, be accepted? 2. How many names are you now receiving daily?

1. Until further notice. In response to the request of a number of women's organizations, which meet this month, it has been decided to keep the lists open a few weeks longer. 2. From 7,000 to 10,000 daily. These are being classified by States as rapidly as they are received. We ask friends of the movement everywhere to use every means to hasten the sending in of signatures.

Mrs. Maud M. W., Brewer, Me. Under what government are the Jews to-day?

In Palestine they are under Turkey; in Russia, under the Czar, and elsewhere they are under Great Britain, Germany, the United States, etc. In the time of Christ they were under the Romans.

E. S. W., Aurora, Ind. Can you explain the miracle described in Joshua 10: 13, of the sun standing still?

The writer of Joshua quotes, as you will see by referring to the passage, from the poetical book of Jasher. It is probably a poetic conception of the phenomenon. It is obvious that it could not have been the standing still of the sun that occurred, as that would not have lengthened the day, which was the purpose desired. Only the stoppage of the revolution of the earth on its axis could have had that result. It is probable that through the refraction of light, or some such cause, that the day appeared to be lengthened, and this would be attributed in those times to the sun standing still.

Reader. 1. Do the delegates to the coming Church Federation in New York pay their own expenses? 2. If not, and if they are raised by popular subscription, to whom should contributions be sent?

1. This highest ecclesiastical assembly of twenty-seven Protestant denominational bodies, with an aggregate membership of over seventeen millions, promises to be the most remarkable religious gathering ever held in this country. The delegates pay their own transportation expenses to New York. It is, therefore, necessary that New York, with its proverbial hospitality, should extend a welcome to them, and should also bear the expense of entertaining them while in attendance on the Conference. These expenses, with the rental of Carnegie Hall and other items connected with the Conference, will be not less than eighteen thousand dollars. 2. Any contributions should be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. Alfred R. Kimball, 90 Bible House, New York City.

M. E. H., Kenton, O. Is sickness always sent, as I have been told, as a punishment?

By no means. That is a cruel idea, unworthy of a Christian. The book of Job is a protest against such a doctrine. Some people suffer through injuries received in infancy. Others through infection received in voluntary service to the afflicted. Some there are who bear cheerfully and patiently lifelong illness, and God is honored by reason of their behavior. The sick have enough to bear without our acting the part of Job's comforters, whom God rebuked.

Mrs. C. W., Centreville, Iowa. Who was Belshazzar's father?

Labynetus, otherwise known as Nabonidus, the king. Josephus calls him Naboandel, Berosus gives Nabonidus as the name, Eusebius calls him Nabonnidochus, and Ptolemy Nabonadius. Daniel mentions Nebuchadnezzar as father, but commentators believe he was his grandfather.

C. M. H., Old Town, Va. As the future life is not revealed in the Old Testament, whence did the Pharisees in Christ's time obtain the idea?

Are you sure that the future life was not revealed in the Old Testament? The Psalmist said (Ps. 17: 15): "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness. I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Again (Ps. 49: 15): "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for he shall receive me." And still more emphatically (Ps. 73: 24): "Thou wilt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory." Job is sure (19: 25, 26) that after his skin is destroyed, without his flesh he will see God. Daniel delares that they who turn many to righteousness will shine as the stars forever and ever. If such passages as these, of which there are many others, were not enough to give the Pharisees their idea of a future life, there were others in the apocrypha as explicit, that may have done so.

T. A. S., Setauket, N. Y. Can you find in the Bible, any statement showing that at the time of the great flood any person except Noah and his family were invited or permitted to enter the Ark?

The Bible record mentions only eight persons, viz.: Noah, his wife, his three sons, and their wives (Gen. 7: 7 and II. Peter 2: 5).

M. D., South Carolina. Where can I find this quotation:

"Right forever on the scaffold,
Wrong forever on the throne"?

It is from Lowell, and the correct quotation is: "Truth forever on the scaffold," etc.

From a Montana reader comes the following letter, which is a sample of others that are now reaching us from all parts of the Union:

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH—I started out one day to get signers to the Anti-Smoot cause. I got seventeen. All were willing to sign. And many were even anxious. Mormonism is our next-door neighbor. Who can know them better than we do? The half has not been told. A woman in Salt Lake went to a near neighbor. A friend of mine was there. She said, "No one knows our heart aches. My daughter's husband was sent to Europe as a missionary. His time was out and we were looking for him home. The house was set in order for his home-coming. He was in New York, and the children and wife were anxiously awaiting him, when a message came to prepare another room. He was bringing home another wife. The mother fainted and was delirious for a time." MRS. ——

M. A. R., Hudsonville, Miss. Why are we to make friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness, as directed in Luke 16: 9?

The translation of the passage in the Revised Version is clearer: "Make to yourselves friends by means of the Mammon." The duty inculcated was that of using money to relieve the need of others. Christ taught, that the soul entering heaven would be greeted and welcomed by men grateful for services rendered to them on earth. Money would not secure an entrance into heaven, but it might be so used on earth as to enhance the happiness of heaven. We cannot imagine sorrow in heaven, but if there is any man who feels regret, it is he, who on earth saw his poor brother suffer for the lack of money, that he might have given out of his abundance. In heaven he cannot ease the burden of earth, but he must regret that when it was in his power he did not do it.

H. McA., Ottawa, Canada. 1. Is an exemplary moral life a godly, Christian life? 2. Would it be possible for an agnostic to lead a moral life?

1. Not necessarily. There may be no acknowledgment of God in it. The man may do his duty toward his fellow-men, yet never recognize that he has a duty toward God. He may never thank him for his love and kindness, never seek pardon for the sins he has surely committed, nor accept the offer of salvation that God has placed within his reach. Such a life having nothing of God in it cannot be called a godly life. 2. Yes, he might, but the probabilities are against it. He rejects the most potent help that he can have, to a good moral life—the help of the Holy Spirit—and would probably fail. It is an insult to God to make no use of his offer.

Subscriber, Hartford, Conn. Was the Apostles' Creed really composed by the Apostles?

There is no evidence of the fact. If they had composed it, Luke in the Acts, or Paul in the Epistles, would scarcely have omitted to mention it. The Westminster divines, in adding it to the catechism, said: "It is here annexed, not as though it were composed by the Apostles, or ought to be esteemed as canonical scripture, but because it is a brief sum of the Christian faith agreeable to the Word of God." If the Creed had been so ancient as the apostolic age, the Fathers disputing with heretics would not have omitted an argument so authoritative and conclusive if it had been in existence. It was probably composed in the second century, and gained its title by its professing to be a summary of the teaching of the Apostles.

.., Pittsburg, Pa. What do you understand by the soul eating and drinking as described in Lev. 7: 18?

Simply that the word soul is used in the ace of the word person. The soul can- t eat and drink. The Jew doing the bidden things, was warned that he ught sin upon his soul.

der, Scranton, Pa. Ought not believers to perform the service of foot-washing, as enjoined by Christ (John 13: 14)?

If there is need for that or any other vice, by a brother, the Christian should der it, but it need not be done as a urch rite. In Palestine, at that time, en men went barefoot, or wore sandals, st accumulated on the feet, and it was as essary to wash them frequently as we d it to wash the hands. It was one of menial tasks expected of the lowest vants. When Christ did it he took the ce of a servant, and that is the position enjoined on his followers. It need not confined to foot-washing. If you go the house of a sick neighbor and find ere is need of his bed-room being eansed, and he has no one to do it, you ll fulfil Christ's injunction just as fully washing the floor. The duty is that of nistering to those in need, and this you do in many ways. The ostentatious shing of the feet of beggars, as performed by certain potentates in Europe, ows a childish literalism that has no erit in it.

R., Troy, N. Y. What ten countries have the largest or densest population, per square mile?

According to the figures lately issued, ten countries showing the greatest nsity of population per square mile are: lgium, 587; Great Britain, 347; Netherds, 407; Italy, 294; China, 272; Gerny, 269; Japan, 289; Porto Rico, 265; itzerland, 208; France, 188.

roubled, Topeka, Kans. Have I not the right to consider myself a Christian, having been converted in early life, though I am not now connected with any church?

If you have kept your faith and are anifesting Christ's spirit and serving him, u have a right to consider yourself a ristian, though we think you are wrong not connecting yourself with a Church. ou would be setting a good example and uld get good to yourself by joining some dy of Christians. Christ required a pubconfession of him, which can be best ne by associating with his people, thus ting it be known where you stand. Do t make the mistake of relying on past perience. If you are not now living the ristian life, there is ground for fear that e conversion of which you speak was t genuine.

Reader, Chicago, Ill. What was the number of the people whom Moses led out of Egypt?

There are no means of definitely stating the number. In Ex. 12: 37 the number of the males about twenty years of age is given as about six hundred thousand. If the number of women and children was in about normal proportions, the total number of the host would be about two millions. At the counting done at Sinai the same discrimination of adults was practiced, and the exact number is given as 603,550.

"Puzzled," Brooklyn, N. Y. Did God really desire sacrifices, as stated in Psalm 51: 19, or not desire them, as stated in the sixteenth verse of the same Psalm?

The orthodox explanation of the apparent contradiction is, that from the sinner he required first of all the sacrifice of a broken heart, as stated in the sixteenth verse, and until that had been rendered, the sacrifice of animals was not desired or accepted. When that had been rendered, the sinner might present his sacrifice of bullocks, etc. The explanation of the higher critics is, that verse nineteen formed no part of the Psalm as originally written, but was added by some priest who feared that the Psalm, as it stood, would discourage the people from bringing sacrifices, and so diminish the income of the temple staff.

R. S. E., Philadelphia, Pa. Is it true that Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, before his death, withdrew from the Baptist Church and became a Congregationalist?

It is not true. He was a firm Baptist to the end. But he did withdraw from the Baptist Union of ministers because he did not agree with them on the inspiration of the Bible and certain other doctrines. He held these as vital, while he believed that others were inclined to modify them, and he could not remain in fellowship under the circumstances.

Easiest-Reading Bible

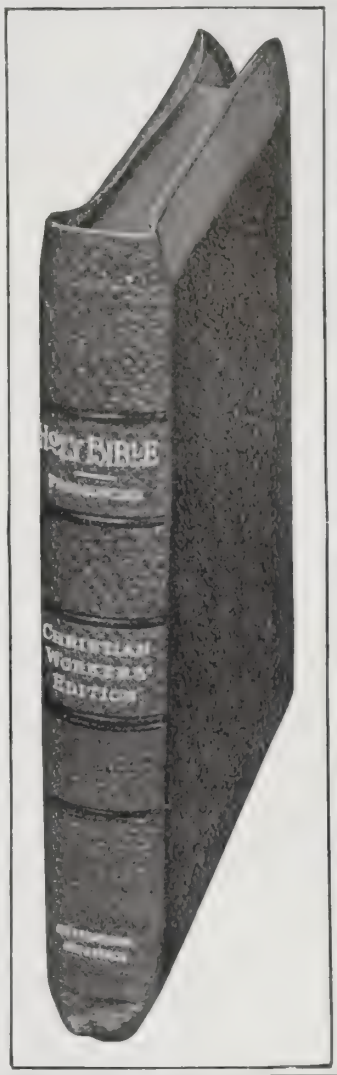
The Bible is more than a book; it is a whole library; the combined work of many authors living at different times in different lands.

The mere reader of the Bible, even though intelligent and religious, will miss much of the precious truth that often lies hidden under the mass of matters which to many appear unconnected. In the "International"

Christian Workers' Bible

the Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular lecturer and preacher on Bible themes, has evolved a new plan of indexing and marking that makes Bible reading not only easy but exceptionally attractive.

By means of red lines under the wording and along the margin Dr. Hurlbut has tied together in one harmonious whole each important topic. For instance, take the text, "Whosoever will, may be saved." The reader can turn from page to page and by means of the red underlines and key letter quickly read everything in the Bible relating to the theme.



The thread of red ink running through all the books from Genesis to Revelation connects each sacred passage with the others on the same topic.

Three Thousand Selected Texts are arranged on this plan.

The Christian Workers' Bible is not for a special class, but for all who read the Scriptures. The minister will find it indispensable, the Sunday School teacher an invaluable aid, the Y.M.C.A. worker a wonderful help. It is a Bible for the busy man and woman and a crutch for the weak and halt in Scripture reading.

The Christian Workers' Bible is bound in fine Morocco, Divinity Circuit, with overlapping edges and gold-round corners, gold edges with red underneath, silk headband and silk marker. Size of page, 8¼ x 5¼ inches, beautifully printed in large, clear type, on fine dull finish paper.

Published at $4.75, but for quick introduction and for a limited time we offer it at the

Woman's War on Polygamy

A Message From the National League to the Women of America

THE Executive Committee of the National League of Women's Organizations met in Philadelphia recently, to consider the further conduct of the campaign against the serious conditions which have been caused by the defiance of law and the breaking of the vows made by the Mormon hierarchy to the United States Government when Utah received Statehood. The situation is without a precedent in the history of the country. Several States have come into the Union conditionally, with the promise that slavery should not exist in them—and they have always faithfully kept the promises made.

Utah gained admission on the express condition made by Congress in the enabling act, that the constitutional convention "shall provide by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State:

First; That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship. Provided that polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited.

There shall be no union of Church or State, nor shall any church dominate the State or interfere with its functions.

The Government's conditions were agreed to. Utah accepted Statehood under these conditions. The Government, because of the promise made to obey these conditions, restored to the Mormon hierarchy the church property which, for seven years, it had held in confiscation. It also restored to Mormons the franchise which it had taken from them, because by decision of the Federal Court the oaths taken in the Endowment House made it impossible for a Mormon to be a loyal citizen of the United States. It pardoned those who were polygamists, and the State laws legitimized their children. The Gentiles of Utah in every way showed their desire to fraternize with the Mormons after the disloyal and law-breaking features of their faith had been abolished. That was in 1896.

To-day, Utah alone in the sisterhood of States stands in the position of having accepted all this from the Government, and with the great gift of Statehood and the power it gives, Utah has broken every covenant made.

The majority of the Apostles of the Mormon hierarchy are openly living in polygamy. The book of doctrines and Covenants still publishes the doctrine of Polygamy, and Joseph F. Smith testified before the Senate committee that he still believed it and practised it, and preferred to take his chances in standing against the law.

The Mormon hierarchy controls the politics of Utah absolutely. Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Arizona and New Mexico bow to its behests. The Mormon hierarchy dictates to its members how they shall vote, and the assertion that it does this by Divine revelation causes its edicts to be obeyed. The Courts are controlled by Mormonism, and many Gentiles, through desire for commercial and political preferment, are enslaved in its meshes, and have not the courage to speak against it, but defend it. No man can be elected without the approval of the Mormon hierarchy, and the hierarchy gave its consent before Reed Smoot could run for the Senate. He is Apostle, Revelator and Seer in the Mormon hierarchy, to which he admits he owes primary allegiance. Is not this condition of things "union of Church and State?"

Visit Utah to-day. Talk with the men and women who have the courage of their convictions, and one cannot fail to see the blight which spreads over everything, affecting the civil, social, and moral life of the community.

Visit the adjoining States, and see how the power of the Mormon hierarchy has gained ascendancy and recognition there, and it is not difficult to foresee that unless the Government of the United States takes decisive action in calling to account its faithless and law-defiant member, the results will be serious. Men who are law-abiding Mormons, who dare ask the hierarchy why they do not keep the promises made to the Government, are immediately excommunicated and cut off and boycotted in every possible way. The absolute domination over civil, social, political and family life by the hierarchy, which claims Divine revelation for all it does, has made of Utah a monarchy more absolute than any in the world. This monarchy is antagonistic to the Government.

Mrs. Frederic Schoff

The low moral tone of society is evident where vice is taught as virtue, and suffering deluded girls are made to believe themselves wives; where children to-day are coming into the world to bear forever the stain of illegitimacy, and where women from every part of this and other lands are being enticed to the Mormon ranks, knowing nothing until too late of the polygamous side of it.

Let the light shine in. Evil shrinks and withers in the broad light of day. Let all the facts be revealed, and let every woman, every true man, who respects the mother who bore him, join in removing from this great country a plague spot which is a disgrace and a menace to every home.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has won the gratitude of American womanhood in its noble work to aid them in their effort to protect home and country from an inward foe disguised in the cloak of religion. Now the National League of Women's Organizations asks every woman who reads these lines to get signatures to the Memorials, to send letters to the Senators of their States, to circulate anti-Mormon literature, to arrange that in the first week of December in every organization of women, the Mormon situation shall be presented. If speakers cannot be procured, the National Congress of Mothers will send speeches that may be read, and which are accurate and full of facts.

The National League of Women's Organizations can again fill orders for Senator Kearns' speech on "Conditions in Utah" delivered before the Senate last March. Senator Kearns has generously placed 100,000 more at the service of the National League. Orders for the "Mormon Menace" have also been numerous from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is the desire of the League that every library shall have a copy of this book and of Senator Kearns' speech. The pamphlets on Conditions in Utah are for free distribution.

The National League has secured the valuable aid of Hon. Frank J. Cannon of Salt Lake City, and has arranged to have him speak in some Eastern cities during October and November. Senator Cannon was born of Mormon parents, but hated its law-breaking course, and was excommunicated by the Mormon hierarchy because he dared to speak out against their wrong-doing.

The women of Utah are looking eagerly for the help of their sisters throughout the land, to help in freeing them from the degrading influences that surround them.

FOOD DOES IT

Curious How Right Food Rebuilds Body

The benefits of the good, red blood made by Grape-Nuts food is described in a letter from Chicago:

"I was for years sadly afflicted with hemorrhoids caused by constipation, which was the result of impure blood supplied by food not adapted to the needs of the body under certain conditions. My trouble extended to rectal hemorrhoids, which greatly reduced my strength. A surgical operation gave me no relief and I was compelled finally to quit business.

"Luckily, just when things were looking the blackest, some one recommended Grape-Nuts food as a desirable article of diet, and I began (Dec. 1903) its use, and in a few months brought my health back to me.

"The action of my bowels is free and regular now, and this has brought relief from the hemorrhoids. At the same time a neuralgic trouble which had been growing on me and which the doctors could never do anything with, has also disappeared. All this return to health I am free to say I owe to Grape-Nuts food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

Among the Southern Highlanders

BY E. M. MASON

EAVING "The Land of the Sky," Asheville, N. C.—the "Switzerland of America"—our train (on a recent rney) wound around and through the nneled mountains of the Blue Ridge d Appalachian ranges, the highest peaks s side the Rockies. On, over vast lds, we went, through farming districts, e red and yellow soil bearing crops of n and cotton, the latter "white for the rvest."

After about seven hours' ride, the conctor called out "Albemarle!" Here we t Miss Frances E. Ufford, the best own educator of that section. She iefly outlined her twenty-six years of e here in North Carolina.

"Having completed eight years in ıching at Bloomfield, N. J., my way ened, in 1879, to go to Concord, N. C., th Mrs. S. W. Scott. We were to beme Christian workers in the first school r colored girls. Soon we had a remarkle spiritual experience, thirty of the lored girls being converted in two weeks. the conclusion of this revival, a call me from Mr. James B. hite, living near Conrd, N.C. He had been aying for twenty years behalf of the poor nite children of his ighborhood, pleading at teachers might be nt. We felt the hand God guiding us to our ork. After reaching oncord, we agreed to end an hour each day prayer, that we might used of God for his ory. A log-cabin and ur acres of land had een presented for a hool by Mr. White and s aged father. On June), 1879, we went three iles to Rocky Ridge, the log-cabin, where e were greeted by enty children and ung people, whose ages ranged from five twenty-two years. In three weeks' time xty children filled the cabin to overflowg. A "brush arbor" was improvised to ccommodate them. My companion's ealth forbade her remaining more than o months, and for eighteen months nger I held the fort alone. Besides aching sixty or more pupils, a Sunday hool was conducted in the cabin each unday forenoon, and a prayer-meeting the evening. Invitations to hold meetgs a few miles distant were accepted, hese places being reached on horseback.

"How eagerly the people watched for ur coming! Cabin-homes were crowded ith earnest listeners, as the Word of God as unfolded to them. Cottage meetings eld in the school neighborhood resulted n several conversions. The homes of the eople were visited each week. Few of hem had more than one room, which we hared with the family.

"There were some notable conversions.)ne man had been a drunkard forty years. God touched his heart and he came forward, with five of his drinking companions, to sign the pledge. This man kept the pledge inviolate. Every Sabbath afterwards his nickel was dropped into the collection basket, instead of the whiskey till. One of his six sons was converted after united prayers had long been offered in his behalf. God poured out his spirit upon both school and community that first year, and a number of people and pupils confessed Christ.

"In response to appeals made by my associate, $500 was raised and sent us for the erection of a two-story plain building.

Miss Frances E. Ufford

Mr. White's cherished hopes were now realized. A few years later, he had the joy of seeing his two daughters graduate from White Hall Seminary. This name was given in honor of the donor of the first land and log-cabin. Next autumn we opened a boarding and day school, with twelve girls as boarders and fifty boys and girls as day-pupils. God set his seal upon the work by giving us all the unsaved among the boarding pupils that first year.

"Some of the graduates of this pioneer school are now seed-sowers in the mountains of North Carolina, Tennessee and Kentucky. Our log-cabin became a day-school-building. Mothers' Meetings were held, and at the expiration of eight years, when forty-two girls were in attendance at White Hall, we came into possession of a large property at Asheville, over one hundred miles from Concord. This was owned by the late Rev. L. M. Pease, founder of the Five Points House of Industry, New York City, and was valued at thirty thousand dollars. Rev. Mr. Pease laid this property upon God's altar (except a life annuity for himself and wife), for the first school for the Southern Highlanders. From its inception, the results of this work have been marvelous. Hundreds of poor girls have been received and trained, and became earnest Christians. They are now doing grand work; teaching others of their own class.

"A call was received to enter Stanly Co., sixteen miles from Concord, to found a school for boys at Locust Level. Appeal was made for a girls' school at Albemarle, the county seat. The first step was the purchase of an unused schoolhouse, with an acre of land. Then we rented a cottage in the village. Three girls were received as boarders. Next, a rude structure was put up. Miss H. J. Northrup, of Minneapolis, came at this time as volunteer helper, and for seven years she has given her time, talents and self-denying labors in this work wholly free. Our work continues to grow. We need an additional building, in which seventy-five girls may be received. We also need a good experienced voluntary teacher for the Stanly Hall School for Boys."

Any reader who is interested in this deserving educational and religious work among the Southern Highlanders may address Miss F. E. Ufford, Albemarle, Stanly County, N. C.

Dangerous Indulgence*

VERY wise is the provision that the risk of indulgence be frequently brought to the attention even of the Christian. The flesh is so clamorous for gratification, so insistent on its cravings being satisfied, that constant vigilance is necessary against its demands. Not alone in the matter of intoxicants, but in all kinds of carnal indulgence is there need of watchfulness. The flesh wars against the spirit, and will bring it into subjection if it is not steadfastly resisted. The Christian is fighting an insidious enemy. Its approach is masked by the customs of society, by appeals to the gregarious instincts, by the apparent harmlessness of temporary and occasional yielding. Once admitted within the lines of defence, it establishes itself and is not easily ejected.

Indulgence in intoxicating liquors involves danger to fortune. Proof of the fact is seen on all sides. How many are the homes devastated by this enemy! They opened brightly enough; but the father felt that he needed a stimulant. He could speak better, be more cheerful, more witty, more energetic, after drinking a glass of wine or beer. From that stage to the one in which he cannot work without the stimulus is usually a very short one. The end comes when business is neglected and hopeless poverty settles down on the home. In professional life the same course is too often run. The lawyer, the physician, even the clergyman has his periods of depression and lassitude, for which intoxicants provide a remedy. But the remedy is so temporary that it must be often repeated, and in the end becomes a habit imperious and irresistible. The pendulum swings, and the artificial stimulus involves a reaction in which the depression is worse than it was before the remedy was used. The sensations of a man after a night's debauch are more depressing, more paralyzing than those which the debauch temporarily relieved.

Indulgence in intoxicants involves danger to character. It changes the nature of a man. While under their influence, he will do things that, in his sane moments, would have been revolting to him. The sentry that protects the citadal of his soul is put to sleep, and other enemies enter unopposed. The wise king describes a common experience (Prov. 23: 33) when he represents the demon of lust taking possession of a man whose passions are inflamed by wine. For men and women both, the way to immorality is generally prepared by intoxicants. The two passions are in close alliance, and there is no security against falling for the man or woman who yields to the allurements of the intoxicating glass. The indulgence is also notorious for its effect on the temper. Under its influence a man is apt to become quarrelsome. He who would not raise a finger against his friend while in a normal condition, will strike and struggle with him when stirred by fiery potations. Worse still, his wife and children are in danger from his infuriated condition, and he who is kind and loving to them when he is sober, must be avoided when he is drunk.

The greatest of the dangers, however, that result from the indulgence, is the danger to the soul. How many there are who might be saved, if they could only shake themselves free of this horrible slavery! Living in a perpetual alternation between the excitement of indulgence and the depression that follows it, they can give no attention to spiritual things, their ears are deaf to Christ's appeals, and their souls sunk in fatal somnolence.

That the end of these things is death is proved every day, in every community. It is in the beginning that the danger lies. No one who begins the habit expects to become a drunkard. He can stop when he likes, he avers. It is seldom that he indulges. He has full control over himself. It is perhaps after long years that he discovers that he is tied and bound, unable to abstain. It was a wise saying that he who cares little for intoxicants should abstain for the sake of others; and he who does care for them should abstain for his own sake. It is the most gigantic evil of our day and the only remedy for it is resolute and entire abstention from the first indulgence.

How Dr. Day's Comfort Bed Spring Helps Sick People

The head of the Comfort Spring is hinged clear across the frame.

And on each side of the frame there's a lever connected to a notched wheel like a bicycle sprocket.

This is what raises or lowers the head and makes it secure at any angle.

By simply lifting the lever and helping the upward movement a little, a child can lift an adult, from an inch to full sitting position.

How does this lifting head help a sick person? you ask.

Well, in this way: The weight of the body is balanced by springs which raise the entire trunk of the body from the hips up, supporting the spinal column naturally.

Then the head, shoulders and back are sustained by the springs, which "give" just enough to make complete muscular relaxation and rest.

Now, the ordinary way—the old way—is to lift the patient by main strength. This requires exertion on the part of the patient.

Then the nurse or attendant has to hold him there until propped up with pillows, or a chair is placed back of the mattress.

In very sick people, the exhaustion following this arrangement is scarcely overcome before the pillow slips down or becomes hot and uncomfortable and the position cramped.

The "restful" change thus either fails or is only partly accomplished.

Now in many sicknesses this old way—the "prop-up" way, is painful if not positively dangerous.

This is true in Inflammatory Rheumatism, Spinal Complications, Pneumonia, or other Pulmonary disorders, Maternity, Heart Troubles, Acute Intestinal attacks and wasting diseases.

The very suddenness of lifting causes a rush of blood from the head, accelerates the action of the heart, often causes fainting and invites serious consequences.

Dr. Day saw these conditions frequently but there was no way to help them. That's why he invented the Comfort Spring.

With the Comfort Spring there is no slipping down, as with pillows, no heat on the spine, no cramping of position.

There is no exertion on the part of the patient no sudden shock and no fainting.

Because the balanced lifting head is raised gradually and quietly, an inch or two at a time if need be.

And the head is elevated clear across, allowing the occupant free movement from side to side.

And the elevation may be changed as often as other restful positions are wanted.

This conserves the invalid's or convalescent's strength and gives nature a chance to do its work of restoration.

When depressed, the lever and the hinge are concealed, and the bed looks like any other.

And it may be used exactly as any other bed and you would never know the difference except that it makes the best bed you ever slept on.

The elasticity and give which makes the most comfortable bed for the invalid also makes the most comfortable bed for use at all times.

And the lifting head is used by thousands who are not sick, for resting during the day for reading before going to sleep, also to relieve asthma or any difficulty in breathing.

You need at least one Comfort Spring in your house right now, to enjoy while you are in health and to be ready when sickness comes.

The time to get it is now.

People Will Drink Coffee When It "Does Such Things."

"I began to use Postum because the old ad of coffee had so poisoned my whole system that I was on the point of breaking down. and the doctor warned me that I must quit it. My chief ailment was nervousness and dyspepsia trouble.

Any unexpected noise would cause me the most painful palpitation, make me faint and sick.

"I had heard of Postum and began to drink it when I left off the old coffee. It began to help me just as soon as the old effects of the poison kind of coffee passed away. It did not stimulate me for a while, and then leave me sick and nervous as coffee used to do. Instead of that it built up my strength and supplied a constant vigor to my system which I can always rely on. It enables me to do the largest kind of a day's work without getting tired. All the heart trouble, etc., has passed away.

needing somebody new? And, if that's so, won't you take me?"

"But, Anne, we have never yet employed a young lady in this office. We should not know how to deal with one. What could you do?"

"Mr. Guthrie, I should not come here as a young society lady, but as a plain working woman. I know how to obey orders. I write a good hand. I understand stenography and typewriting, and I can keep books by single and double entry. Father will never be able to carry such burdens as he has hitherto borne, nor is it right that he should. He has no sons, so his daughters must help him. I should not ask to stay a week if I did not earn my salary. Everything here appeals to me. It is the atmosphere I want."

"Go home, Anne, and write a formal application for a clerkship in the shipping house of Guthrie, Ramny & Beck, and send it by post. I will see that it is considered. If you come to us you will have the same hours your father had."

"I shall expect no special favors, and will promise to be faithful if you'll take me."

"One word. Does John Harmon know about this move of yours?"

"No, indeed. There is no occasion for telling him."

"When did you study bookkeeping and the rest, and why?"

"I have been quietly preparing myself for the last eighteen months, in order that when the door opened I should enter on a business life. Mr. Guthrie, it is only fair that a girl should have her chance, like a boy, if she wants it."

"I'm old-fashioned, and I'd rather a woman stayed at home and guided the house; but circumstances alter cases, and I like pluck and grit. If Janet ever pined for business, I should not say No to her, but she shows no tokens that way yet."

The old merchant had given the young girl a good slice of his early morning time, so she said good-bye and hurried home. She trod on air. Her feet hardly touched the ground. Already she saw herself in that situation of independance, financially, which most American girls long for, and what did she care for the hardships that might be hers? There were no lions in her path. Long hours, monotonous labor, the drudgery inseparable from the life of an accountant, were as nothing in her sight. She flew to her room when she reached home, and sat down to write her application. Over this she did not hurry. She knew that business men appreciate a good, terse, well-written and concise letter—a letter that says just enough and not too much, and such a letter within the hour she finished and sent, running out herself to drop it in the box at the corner of the street.

"Anne, dearest," called Peggy, "come and help me. These rooms have to be thoroughly gone over before I show them to inquiring guests."

"Oh, say boarders, and be done with it," cried Priscilla, from the landing of the stairs, in a disgusted voice. "We're not taking them for company and they are not guests in any sense."

"Priscilla, subside," said Anne. "Why waste time in regrets. If we do take people in we are going to make them at home, I hope, and we are not forgetful that we are mother's daughters. Can you imagine her in such a frame of mind as yours?"

"I can't imagine mother with strangers in the household at all."

Peggy sighed. Priscilla was never the reasonable sister, and she had been spoiled, because she was regarded as the most beautiful and the most gifted of the trio. She had a certain winsomeness when all went well, but let things run counter to her will or her prejudices and Priscilla was apt to be unamiable. However, she came to Peggy's help about taking down the curtains, rather darkened by summer dust, and amazed both the girls by an offer to do them up herself.

"They are getting too thin to trust to Norah, and besides she is up to her eyes in the downstairs cleaning."

"You are a darling!" cried Anne, as Priscilla hurried off the curtains in a basket that she dragged after her.

Once Infidel, Now Christian

IN connection with the work of the Gospel Mission to the Tombs in New York City, the following incident recently came to light:

D——— was formerly a clergyman in Europe. Having imbibed infidel opinions in his early days, he lost faith in revealed religion, and soon after threw up his charge as pastor and came to America. He found employment as a teacher of languages. Last spring he was thrown into prison on a serious charge, but was finally able to show his innocence and was discharged. While he was in prison, the Tombs chaplain, Mr. Munro, had many conversations with him, in which the chaplain held up before him Jesus Christ the Saviour of sinners. He gave him a New Testament and begged him to read the same prayerfully, which he did. Shortly after his liberation from prison he called upon the chaplain. Holding the little Testament in his hand, he said joyfully: "I am glad to tell you, chaplain, that, though once an infidel, through the reading of this little book I have found the Lord Jesus Christ." Since then he has been at the tent meetings, where he has given testimony for the Master.

Many other recent instances of spiritual transformation in prison might be mentioned in connection with the Tombs Mission. One was that of a man named T———, from Alabama, who since his liberation has been made the means of bringing his entire family into the light. Another was A. E. A., a young man of Christian family, who had lived the wild life of a prodigal until, falling into crime, he was sent to prison. A sermon preached by the chaplain was the means of his conversion. Since his liberation he has been living a consistent Christian life.

Any reader interested in the work of the Tombs Mission can procure a copy of the last report by writing to Chaplain Munro or to the treasurer, Mr. Geo. E. Sterry, 79 Pine Street, New York City.

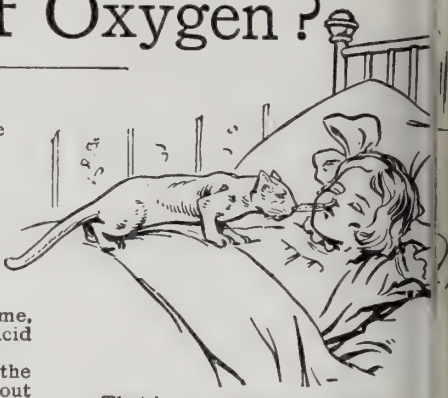
How Many Children Die for Want of Oxygen?



A tweny-four Candle-Power City Gas-Jet, or——A 24 Candle-Power Gasoline Light, or——A good Kerosene Lamp rated at 25-candle power of Light, burns up all the Oxygen in about 30 cubic feet of Air every hour you use it.

Think of what that means to Health (365 nights in the year) in a living or sleeping room!

They produce, at the same time, about 20 cubic feet of Carbonic Acid every hour.

And that Carbonic Acid is what the lungs throw off when they breathe out dead tissue from the body.

It is a poison so dangerous that it would kill you in five minutes if you breathed it pure.

Now, I'm not trying to scare you, but am merely telling you something you can prove for yourself by setting a lighted lamp in a closed room till it dies out for want of the very Oxygen it burns up.

It takes a lot of bad treatment to actually kill a person however,—bad Food,—bad Air,—Cruelty or Heart Ache.

And, the City Gas Jet, Gasoline Light, or Kerosene Lamp, as generally used, is only a slow poison.

Because Ventilation dilutes the Carbonic Acid so you don't notice the effect of each single dose at the time it is taken.

But, it "gets there" just the same,—weakening the System, helping on Disease, and obscuring the Merry Sunshine of Life,—its Cheerfulness.

That's why these Oxygen Consuming Lights need watching.

Kerosene used to be about the only Light that could be had in small towns, villages, country houses, and farm houses.

So that people had to put up with it, even though it poisoned the Air slowly, and raised the death rate heavily through Fires as well.

But it's different now!

Acetylene Light can be had at less cost than common Kerosene Light.

Do you know about Acetylene?

It used to be an experiment once, but now it is like the Telephone or Automobile—a perfected fact.

There have been hundreds of faulty Acetylene Generators made in the experimental stage of its history. But there has never been poor Acetylene Light when properly made, as it universally is today.

Acetylene is the clearest Light,—the purest, whitest, safest, coolest Light ever made by Man.

It comes so near to Sunlight that it will actually make Plants grow by night under its wholesome, healthful rays.

And, because it is so clear and pure, with so little color-fog to muddy it—so free from flicker and glare,—it is the easiest Light on the eyes yet discovered.

It is 10 to 15 times stronger than Kerosene Light, City Gas Light, or standard Electric Light.

On this account it is cheaper than any of the three.

Because, only a tenth as much of it need be used to produce the same clear-reading effect.

That is one reason why it burns u only one-fourth as much of the livin Oxygen in the air of a room as Kero sene, Gasoline, or City Gaslight.

And that's why it leaves only on tenth as much poisonous Carbonic Aci in the air of a room, after it, to b breathed and re-breathed by the peopl in that room, in place of the Life-Givin Oxygen consumed.

Moreover, that's why it is one-third cheaper than even Kerosene Light fron the best Lamps yet invented.

A 24 Candle Power City Gas Je costs you half a cent per hour,

A good 25-candle-power Kerosen Lamp will burn a 12-cent gallon of Kero sene in five nights, if lighted four hour a night.

That would make it cost three-fifth of a cent per hour, or $8.76 a year, fo Kerosene alone, to say nothing of broke Lamp Chimneys, new Wicks, and th everlasting Labor and Risk of cleanin them.

A 24-candle-power Acetylene Ligh will cost you a third less than that,—o two-fifths of a cent per hour.

That means only $5.84 per year, i used the same number of hours for 36 nights.

And, there's less Work needed fo fifty Acetylene Lights than for on single Kerosene Lamp, with far les danger, as the Insurance Records prove

That's a matter well worth you consideration—the comparative danger

Over two million people in America now use Acetylene Light, and yet, the Insurance Records show that there were only four fires from it in one year.

The same authority shows that there were 8,865 Fires from Kerosene, and Gasoline, during the same year.

And, the Insurance Records can't afford to lie.

FEW days ago there sailed from Montreal, Can., after a year's rest in the United States, the Rev. Dr. Herbert and Mrs. Andrews, the president and ceptress of Woodstock College, Mussorie, India. Both are veteran missionaries of the American Presbyterian Board, having been on the field twenty-two and seventeen years, respectively. They have devoted themselves especially to the evangization and training of Eurasian girls who intend to become the future native workers of India. Woodstock College was established in 1854-56—the first Protestant school for girls in India. It is situated along the foot-hills of the Himalayas. Its students are the children of missionaries in India, Burma, Siam, and points along the Persian Gulf. Graduates of Woodstock are now laboring in Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, and Episcopal Mission fields, and are among India's best workers.

Dr. and Mrs. H. M. Andrews

ncient Roman Pleasure-ship

MINDS of great antiquarian interest are reported from the vicinity of Lake Nmi, in Italy. For some time past engineers have been attempting to raise the imperial galleys of Tiberius and Caligula, which are beneath the waters of the lake. Originally, the lake was known as the "Lake of Diana's Wood," and there was once on its banks a temple to the goddess. The Romans called the lake "The Mirror of Diana." Wealthy Romans made its banks a pleasure-ground, and they were allowed by the Emperors, who combined the worship of Diana with banquets, dances, and other amusements given in magnificent galleys on the lake. Remains of these galleys have been found from time to time. At the bottom of the lake, lately, two galleys of special magnificence have been found, one of which is shown in the illustration.

The Galley Found in Lake Nemi

Called Higher

Died in Kansas City, July 3, 1905, James V. Acker. Born March 3, 1862, in Richardson County, Neb.

At Mansfield, Tenn., Mrs. Mattie Mabry was called away on March 31, 1905, at the age of forty-two years, eight months. "She lived for Christ, the living head. In him, she lives—say not—she's dead."

Suddenly, at Fall River, Mass., on July 18, 1905, Rev. B. F. Aiken. Mr. Aiken had left his home in Somerset, Mass., in the morning, in order to transact some business in Fall River. As he was about to return by train, he inadvertently stepped backward upon the track, just as a train came along, and was instantly killed. Mr. Aiken was an earnest Christian and greatly beloved in the community where he lived; ready with kind words and sympathy for those in trouble, and a helper in all good works. Mr. Aiken was a life subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Consecrated Leader

By Mrs. M. Baxter

ABOUT seventy-eight years after the decree of Cyrus, and the first return from captivity of nearly fifty thousand children of Israel, God stirred up Artaxerxes, who seems to have been the successor of Xerxes (was he Esther's son?) to send a second contingent of about fifteen hundred Jews to Jerusalem, to strengthen their brethren, and to pray for the King of Persia, to whom the Jews were tributary. If he was the son of Xerxes by Esther, it is easy to understand his action. While God was thus disposing the king, he had a man in his divine workshop on whom he had put his hand, whom he was preparing for a work of solid reform in Jerusalem. Ezra was "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ezra 7: 6); the king calls him "a perfect scribe of the law of the God of heaven" (Ezra 7:-12 marg.). But above and beyond his knowledge of God's Word, he was a man whose heart was in it, he "had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do and to teach in Israel."

Such was the man to whom the king wrote a letter, authorizing him to go up to Jerusalem, "and all they of the people of Israel, and of his priests and Levites in my realm, which are minded of their own free will go up to Jerusalem." The king sent them thither "to inquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem according to the law of God, which is in thine hand," and he gave almost a carte blanche for "whatsoever more may be needed," saying: "Whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven, let it be diligently done for the house of the God of heaven, for why should there be wrath against the realm of the king and his sons?" (vers. 20-23) Moreover, he ordained that all the ministers of the house of God should be exempt from taxation, and he appointed Ezra to be supreme governor of Jerusalem, that he might teach the law of God with full powers of punishment against such as "will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king" (vers. 24-26). It seems hardly possible that this king Artaxerxes could have been an idolater. It is true he says, "thy God," "your God," "their God;" but that was the true distinction of the Jews from other nations: they served the living God in contradistinction to those who worshiped idols.

But all this was in answer to Ezra's prayer (Ezra 7: 6), and he recognized the king only as God's instrument. "The Lord God of our fathers . . . put such a thing into the king's heart . . . and hath extended mercy to me before the king and his counsellors, and before all the king's mighty princes. And I was strengthened as the hand of my Lord God was upon me." This was the confidence of this man, in this he trusted more than in the kings' letter which he carried with him. So that, knowing there were enemies, and such as lay in wait by the way to be met with, and many difficulties in this four months' march, Ezra observed a day of fasting and waiting upon God at the river of Ahava, probably one of the tributaries of the Euphrates, "that we might humble ourselves before our God, to seek of him a right [or straight] way for us, and for our little ones, and for all our substance." Ezra knew that the whole route was known to God, and that he could indicate which of two paths was the safest for them. When shall we learn in our family, our business, and church difficulties to give time for fasting and prayer, until God shows us our way?

Ezra shows how dear was the honor of God to him. "For I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way, because we had spoken unto the king, saying: The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him; but his power and his wrath is against all that forsake him. So we fasted, and besought our God for this, and he was intreated of us." Ezra felt that the interests of Artaxerxes' soul demanded that he, Ezra, should live up to his teaching, and he knew God well enough to be sure that he was running no risk to trust wholly in him. God was true to them, and this large caravan of one thousand five hundred souls traveled in safety under his good hand until they arrived in Jerusalem, delivered over the king's offering for the house of God, and offered burntofferings to Jehovah in his own temple, in his own holy city, Jerusalem.

No whiskey or nasty medical ads. are ever seen in the columns of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. It is clean, wholesome and bright. A single issue is worth more than the whole year's subscription. Our offer to refund your money if you do not like it after three months' trial is a guarantee that no other magazine ever dared to make.

OUR MAIL BAG

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

The Twentieth Century Home

We have received the following communication from Mr. John Brisben Walker, editor of The Twentieth Century Home, Irvington, N. Y., which may be of interest to a large number of our readers.

As stated in a previous circular, the sale of the Cosmopolitan Magazine entailed the reorganization of the entire advertising, editorial and business staffs of The Twentieth Century Home. This has now been accomplished, and on the 15th day of November our subscribers will receive the next issue.

The Twentieth Century Home will hereafter be published at the rate of fifty cents, instead of one dollar a year. This reduction in price will entitle its present subscribers to receive the magazine for double the term of their unexpired subscriptions. That is, for each month of The Twentieth Century Home to which they are now entitled, they will be entered on the subscription list for two months. Yours very truly,

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME.

C. M. R., Mobile, Ala. I have often heard of marvelous feats being performed by so-called "spiritualists," such as having a table move around the room of itself, letters written on slates by unseen hands, and messages received from persons long ago dead. Will you please give me your opinion through THE MAIL-BAG as to whether or not these feats are actually performed, and if so, by what power?

Spiritualism or spiritism is not a science, but a psuedo-science, and is largely in the hands of charlatans and those who use it for imposition and money-making. Practically all the tricks and wonderful displays of occult power that are seen at seances have been fully exposed and explained. These include table-tipping, slate-writing, etc. This sort of cheap and silly jugglery, which is the result of simple sleight-of-hand, is nauseating to serious inquirers, though it seems to impress the shallow-minded and credulous. To any one with common sense, it must occur that spirits, if they re-visited the earth, would have more important tasks than playing pranks and tipping tables.

T. H. J., Kila, Mont. In the parable of the unjust steward (Luke 16: 1-8), are we to understand that Christ commended him?

No, it was his own lord who commended him. Dr. William Taylor, in his lecture on this parable, paraphrases the passage thus: "What a shrewd fellow the man was! If his probity had been equal to his wisdom or prudence, he might have risen honestly to wealth." It was as if a man, whose house had been broken into, while deploring his own loss, could admire the dexterity of the burglar. Our Lord's purpose in relating the parable, appears to have been to show how much more in earnest worldly men are in seeking earthly riches, than godly men are in seeking heavenly treasures.

E. J. D., Yarmouth, Me. 1. Do you believe that the spirits of the departed are near us, though unseen? 2. Would one who disregarded religion all through life, but sought Christ in his last illness be saved, though he did not obtain full assurance? 3. Is there progression after death?

1. It is a common belief, or rather hope. It is said (Heb. 1: 14), that the angels are ministering spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation. Our departed friends would naturally desire to take part in such ministry, and who can tell that their desire is not granted? 2. Yes, even at the last, mercy would be granted to a penitent who sought it sincerely. Such a person might not attain to full assurance, and probably would not, but that is not necessary to salvation. 3. We know very little of the future life, but we should expect progression. The dead in Christ are in the right place to gain knowledge, and the association with the saints in the presence of God must surely lead to spiritual development.

R. C., Mineral Wells, Texas. Is there any such planet as Vulcan?

Whether there is a planet between Mercury and the sun, named Vulcan, has long been a matter for discussion by astronomers. On several occasions, during the total phase of a Solar eclipse, an unidentified object has been seen and too hastily announced as a planet. Totality lasts too short a time to detect orbital motion, which would in a moment settle the question. During the last three total Solar eclipses no suspect has been seen. My own opinion is that no hypothetical Vulcan exists. LEWIS SWIFT, F.R.A.S.

Marathon, N. Y.

J. J. A., Germantown, Pa. 1. What is the Jewish population of the world at the present time and how is it distributed? 2. What are the largest Jewish cities of the world?

1. Total Jewish world population, 11,102,389, of which Asia has 342,410; Europe, 8,786,122; Africa, 382,432; America, 1,574,022; Australasia, 17,403. 2. Largest Jewish cities are: New York, 672,776; London, 138,860; Vienna, 150,000; Berlin, 86,000; Lodz (Poland), 150,000; Paris, 65,000; St. Petersburg, 15,270; Amsterdam, 60,000; Constantinople, 60,000; Chicago, 60,000; Jerusalem, 41,000. These figures are from the latest edition of the Jewish Year-Book, published in London.

D. M. C., Aylmer, Ont. 1. Can you tell me the age of Joseph Grigg, when he wrote the lines beginning with

"Jesus, and shall it ever be A mortal man ashamed of thee?"

2. Will Christians stand before the Great White Throne? 3. Was Saul of Tarsus converted at the time he beheld the vision on the way to Damascus, or when Ananias laid his hands on him?

1. Joseph Grigg, an English Presbyterian pastor in London, is said to have written, "Jesus, and shall it ever be—" when he was ten years old. Most of his hymns were written between 1756 and 1765. The dates of his other productions besides the one mentioned, are uncertain. They were published in a small volume in 1861. 2. Paul says (Rom. 14: 10): "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ;" and he repeats it (II Cor. 5: 10). It is doubtful, however, whether that is the judgment of the Great White Throne, or is not rather an earlier judgment that is the apportionment of reward. 3. We have no source of information other than the narratives in the Acts, which, doubtless, you have examined. The fact that Ananias addressed him as "Brother Saul" (Acts 9: 17), would seem to us to imply that he was already a Christian.

C. H. K., Peter's Creek, Pa. Why do the evangelists trace Christ's descent through Joseph? Was it not more important to give the pedigree of Mary, since we are taught that God was his father?

The purpose of publishing the genealogy, was to show that Jesus had descended from David. If the genealogy of Mary had been given, it would have carried no weight with the Jews, as they would not admit the divine conception, and regarded Joseph as the head of the family. It was necessary, on their account, to show that Joseph had descended from David. It really, however, includes the others, as the descendants of David were so proud of their distinction, and of the Messianic promise involved, that no man of that family would take a wife of any other family. Mary, undoubtedly, therefore, was descended from David. Weiss, a very eminent scholar, however, contends that the pedigree in Luke 3, is really that of Mary, and that the parenthesis in the twenty-third verse indicates this, and should read: "Being supposed to be the son of Joseph, the son-in-law of Heli," thus making Heli the father of Mary.

L. E. S., Davenport, Iowa. Was the miracle of the tongues (Acts 2: 6-12) worked on the speakers or the hearers?

There is no definite statement, but the natural inference is that it was upon the speakers. Peter's defense (Acts 2: 15), appears to indicate that the speakers were preaching in languages with which they were not familiar, On the other hand, it is believed by some scholars, that two hearers of different nationalities heard and understood the sermon preached in a language usually unintelligible to both. Paul's references to the miracles of the tongues at a later period (I. Cor. 14) implies, however, that it was upon the preachers that such miracles were worked.

F. H., Washington, D. C. Will you please inform me what are the duties of a choir leader? Has he the right to change singers and dismiss them from the choir?

If there is a music committee, the power to employ and dismiss rests with the committee. If the choir-master is appointed with power, he can reorganize the choir. This is quite customary in many churches.

We are always glad to receive encouraging letters, but our friends must excuse us from publishing them. Occasionally, some reader writing impersonally, gives us the opportunity to quote a line or two, as in the following from C. A. V., of Detroit, Mich.:

We all prize THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—1. For its evangelical aim and spirit; 2. For its admirable up-to-date illustrations; 3. For its news of missions and Christian work in all parts of the world; 4. For its liberal premiums.

May it long bless the Church and the world!

T. J. P., Mariaville, Neb. How is it that neither Matthew nor Mark mention the penitence of the thief on the cross? Did he really repent as Luke says?

They omit much that Luke records—the raising of the son of the widow of Nain; the story of Zaccheus; the walk to Emmaus and many parables. None of the Evangelists regarded his work as in any sense a complete biography. Luke appears to have been a careful, painstaking man, and gathered up much that the other two omitted, while John tells much that Luke also omitted. There is no reason to doubt the genuineness of the narrative. In that hour of panic the incident may have been known to few of the disciples.

Estelle S., Brumley, Mich. If a neighbor comes to the house on Sunday for a quart of milk, is it wrong to sell her the milk, if you do not take pay for it till Monday?

Certainly not. It would be most ungracious, un-neighborly and un-Christian to refuse. You might be depriving her children of their breakfast.

J. A. C., Lynn, Mass., writes:

I send the following in answer to question in THE MAIL BAG. The headstone in West Lynn cemetery bears the inscription: "Mary Pitcher 1738-1813." She was known as "Moll Pitcher, the Pythoness of Lynn." She was the daughter of Aholiab Dimond, of Marblehead, Mass., and was born in the tenement house known as "Old Brig," junction of Pond and Orne Streets, in 1738. She married Robert Pitcher August 22, 1760. She lived in a small, one-story house, inclosed by a wooden fence, at the southern base of High Rock, Lynn, Mass. She was a fortune-teller and was sometimes termed a "witch." She died April 1, 1813.

Subscriber, Mechanicsburg, Pa. We must decline to discuss politics. You will find the party platforms in almost any current almanac.

Reader, Bercail, Mont. The mortality in the United States from drink is not officially computed, but it probably differs little from the European rate of one in every seven deaths, between the ages of thirty-five and fifty-five.

J. M. N., Emlenton, Pa. We do not think it wise to introduce politics into the church or to hold political meetings within its walls, although there may be occasions (as during a great public uprising against immorality and wickedness in high places) when it might be justifiable. But it is best at all times to do the practical work of politics elsewhere.

F. A. P., Hartland, Vt. There is a great difference between the occasional, or inadvertent law-breaker and the deliberate and persistent offender. Doubtless, Senator Cullom had the latter alone in mind. Besides, bad laws (those that are oppressive or tyrannous), were not in the question at all, but only righteous laws, that are approved by the nation as a whole.

The Charm of Life in Mexico

By Elizabeth V. McGary

THE very name Mexico breathes a charm. One is held in a spell from the moment he is borne over t: Rio Grande, where his travel-i:-bag and trunk are searched wh such hawk-like vigilance—every garment, ery article, being shaken out, and the custom ipectors even unroll hose and take the tooth-brush fm its case. Blanketed natives swarm about the tin when it stops, beseeching you to buy their tnkets or so-called edibles, and smiling sweetly if yu don't. Oftentimes it would indeed require a viated appetite to crave or even brave eating ne of these. There are boiled eggs, baked sweet tatoes, and roasting ears boiled in the shucks, d in no way appetizing. But the smile and persuasive insistence of the ragged ild-pedler is almost irresistible. Then there are old, old people, who huddle about d sell bright blankets, or toys made from dry cornstalks, and the most grotesque er concocted for a child's delectation. There are ragged, pitiful beggars, and flower dlers almost hidden beneath their fragrant burdens of American beauty-roses or chids, that may be purchased for twenty-five cents Mexican money, per armful.

Lying about the narrow streets, or on palm-shaded plazas, in which splash sparkling fountains, are the dark-skinned pobres, while tripping past in high-heeled shoes, th their duennas, are the senoritas aristocraticas. his plaza walking is a favorite pastime. Men of the gh class walk in one direction, the girls in another, d speak with the pretty little greeting, adios, in ssing. There are three walks, the first for the istocrats and all Americans; the next for the ddle class, and the inside, among the magnolia es and flowers, is for the pobres. If an aristoatic young man finds himself in love with one of e dark-eyed maidens, he parades before her iron-rred window for weeks, three times a day, never ring to stop and speak to her—this would be ebeian—but he whispers as he passes, divina, or merosa. When this has continued for many eeks, with some mild encouragement from the aiden, her cavalier sends a band to serenade her midnight with the tenderest airs. Then her owed lover may call and, in the presence of all e family, request her hand in marriage. Such a ing as attention without this intention is unheard in Mexico. Never does he spend a moment alone ith her before their marriage. If he takes her to e concert, he must needs take her sisters or some f the relatives. Finally, he buys her trousseau, r this is one of their queerest customs. At the edding feast comes the sacred ceremony in the rly morning at the cathedral. It is very pretty, sting two hours. The girl always wears pure hite, and when she kneels on satin pillows, a part f her veil is brought over and pinned on his oulder. The next day comes the civil ceremony.

The home life is idle and dreamful. They rise te, eat a light breakfast, idle about until eleven, hen eat again. About 1.30, they have a two-hours' inner in courses, after which they take a long siesta. At 5 they have merenda, which consists of the Mexican thick chocolate, which only Mexicans know how to make, and cake. At about 8.30 or 9.30, they have a big, rich supper. They spend so much time over their meals, chatting and making merry, that there is little of the day left for anything else.

Prices in Mexico are only half of what they would be in "the States," in fact, a tour of the Republic can be made far cheaper than anywhere else, because of this difference in hotels, tips, carriage hire and street carfare. On some lines it is five cents Mexican, on others six; but if you are not watchful, the monk-like conductor, in his long, black cowl, will keep the change every time and be utterly unable to understand your protestations. If a Mexican sees you admiring anything of his he offers it to you, and insists upon your taking it. If you do, and fail to return it in two days, they think you very unprincipled. One good old American was persuaded to accept as a gift, a pretty Mexican blanket he admired, and was later called a thief, because he failed to return it. Utter suavity, at any cost, is their method.

They are a vain, insincere people, yet the sweetest friends in the world if they really love you. They have the most bemirrored homes—several are to be found in every room—long mirrors that reach almost from the ceilings to the floors. Babies wear flaming pink, peons bathe once a year, and then only as a religious custom, on June 24—el dia de San Juan Bautista—beggars and cripples throng the streets, motormen remove their hats every time they pass a church, and every handsome Mexican smiles and comments aloud about the senoritas who pass.

A waxen figure of the Saviour, with nail-pierced hands and feet, is to be found in coffins in the churches at Easter, and Judas Iscariot and Mrs. Judas (made of papier mache), are burned in the streets by all classes.

In the magnificent cathedral, built by the thousands and thousands of dollars of the poor benighted peons is heard the sweetest, earth-stirring music, where hang pictures from the old masters, where little acolytes in scarlet cassocks scatter incense, and purple-robed priests chant Latin prayers; the flower markets—gloriously, fragrantly beautiful; the general markets, and most of all the curious thieves' markets, whose proprietors steal all their stock, and sell things for a song—this market, where a golden candelabra may be found in a stall beside a saddle or a tooth-brush; the Parisian shops, the curious government pawn shops or Montes de Piedades, as they call them—all these make Mexico so wondrous, so fascinating, so novel, that you go again and again, and learn to believe the tradition, that a man who has once crossed the Rio Grande river will be assuredly drawn to come again to that matchless land of the Montezumas.

Sublime Submission

TEXT: MATT. 5:41:

"Whosoever shall compel thee to go with him one mile, go with him twain"

WHAT Sir Walter Scott was to the moors and glens of old Scotland, romantic with their legends and folk-lore, and what Charles Dickens was to the quaint vernacular of the London streets, and what Fenimore Cooper was to the North American Indian, with his wigwam and his camp-fires, his hates and his loves, Frederick Remington, the great American figure and animal painter, has been to the habits and customs, the comedies and tragedies of the Western cowboy, now almost a relic of the past. Future students of our past history, reading Theodore Roosevelt's Winning of the West, will gain a clearer idea of the scenes and the people there described, if those four volumes are illustrated with Remington's famous pictures, "The Last Stand," "The Crooked Trail," "The Frontier Sketches," and "A Dash for the Timber." But above all the pictures Frederick Remington has sketched, I do not believe there are any more powerful than those in which he depicts the daring exploits of the messengers of the Pony Expresses. Now the East and the West have been married by the wedding ring of the iron rail, and the swift locomotive dashes across the continent; but in former times the gold fields of California would have been cut off from communication with the busy East if it had not been for the useful system of the pony relays.

A Perilous Business

Every thirty or forty miles there was a station. This chain of stations stretched clear across the continent. Then, between these stations, every day a cowboy would ride. Alone upon his horse he rode forth with the mail, and with his saddle-bags often loaded down with gold and precious stones. He rode straight out into the deserts and over the prairies. He rode forth in defiance of Indian murderer and white-skinned highwayman and ferocious wild beast. He rode with his life depending not so much upon the sureness of his aim and the steadiness of his gun as upon the swiftness of the four-footed beast he bestrode. There, in some of the Frederick Remington's "Frontier Sketches," you can see the messenger of the "Pony Express" riding with a score of red-skinned savages on his trail. You can almost hear the pantings of his exhausted horse and the whizzing of the rifle balls as they fly past the cowboy's ears. There he is digging in the spurs in his race with death, or rather in his race for life. Now, in order to get a clear grasp of my text, we should take some of Remington's "Frontier Sketches," in reference to the "Pony Express," and give them an Oriental coloring, and put them among the Palestine Hills of one thousand, ay, of over two thousand years ago.

Albert Barnes tells us that the word "compel" of my text is of Persian origin. It comes from the royal court of Cyrus the Great, who died in 529 B. C. There was no postal system in that day. King Cyrus planned a system of pony expresses all over his empire. Thus, by a system of relays of horses, when the king wished to send a royal command to one of the governors of his provinces, his message could be handed from courier to courier with the greatest expedition. As these couriers had to go through wild regions, like those traveled by the messengers of the pony express during the fifties and the sixties, they had a right to compel any man they met to go with them and protect them, as the county sheriff to-day has a right to compel you or me to help him arrest an offender against the law.

Ancient Postal System

This extensive system of "pony expresses" not only spread throughout Persia, but, in Christ's time, spread through all the Roman Empire and Cæsar's provinces. Thus Jesus, in order to show how his disciples should be willing to sacrifice for any right authority, used a very simple and common illustration. He says, "If any courier shall compel thee to go with him one mile, go with him twain." That means, when an authority asks you to do a certain amount of work, you should be willing to do twice what he asks. Can we not to-day make this application of sublime Gospel concession to the home and to our relations with employers, our churches, and the great world at large, as well as to Cæsar's couriers?

Christ's command of cheerful submission applies to the home. As in the United States Government, the Executive, Legislative and Judicial Departments have their place and their separate functions, so in the home there are co-ordinate powers, each with their duties and their rights. The husband and wife, the parents and children, all come under this divine injunction of mutual concession, and in fulfilling it will promote domestic happiness. If any one in the home has need of a service, it should be cheerfully rendered, aye in double the measure required.

Concession in the Home

It is unwillingness to go the twain mile in the home which causes most of the difficulties of the domestic circle. You know it by personal experience. You hear angry words coming from the children's bedroom. "What is the matter, girls?" I hear you ask. "Why this trouble?" "Oh," answers your daughter Mary, "I cannot stand Jennie's disorder any longer! She was playing with her dolls yesterday, and she left her doll trunk out in the middle of the floor. I have stumbled over it again and again. Now I have fallen and hurt my knee. Then, mother, just look at that bed. It is a perfect sight. It is her time to make it up to-day. I made it yesterday." Then you say, "Daughter, why did you not put the trunk away and make up the bed yourself?" With that Mary angrily tosses her head as she answers, "I simply will not do Jennie's work. I am ready to do my own work, but I am not willing to do her's." Why are the girls quarreling? They are both standing upon their rights. They are not forbearing to each other. They are not willing to carry each other's burdens. They are not willing to go the twain mile. They are willing to do what they have to do, but they are not willing to do what they do not have to do for each other.

What is true about the difficulties between the children of a home is also true in reference to most of the difficulties between husbands and wives. Instead of some men and women looking upon the marriage altar as an opportunity for promoting the happiness of their marital partners, they look upon it as a stepping-stone to a throne, where they can make their husbands or wives work for them. Their marriage altar is not symbolized by the beautiful nuptial ceremony which the Cherokee Indians used to have. There the young bride and groom used to stand upon the opposite banks of a brook and clasp hands over the running waters, to show that hereafter their interests and work were to flow together as the waters of a running stream. But instead of some husbands being willing to go the twain mile for the wife, or some wives being willing to go the twain mile for the husband, each says: "I will do for you what I am compelled to do, and I will not do anything else."

A Remedy for Dissension

A young man woos and wins and marries a young girl. She has been brought up in a well-to-do father's home. She was an only daughter and, to a great extent, she has been spoilt. Time passes on. The young husband tries to keep up a home to the standard in which his wife has been accustomed to live. But the income is too small to meet the outgo. Day after day, he keeps saying, "Nellie, you must economize. You must lessen our expenses. Cannot you make your old hat do this winter? Cannot you send the children to the public school?" "No," she answers. "I shall not. You married me, and it is your place to take care of me. I never heard this nagging question of money, money, money, in my father's home, and I ought not to hear it now." The young man staggers on in his struggle. He takes to drink. Kind words are now exchanged for angry ones. The domestic difficulties culminate in the divorce court. Why? The wife was unwilling to go the twain mile for her husband's love. On the other hand, the husband is just as much to blame as the wife. From sickness or overwork, the wife may become a nervous wreck. In her weakness, is he always gentle? Is he always kind? Is he always thoughtful? Does he try to shield her as he ought? Do the two angels, "Bear and Forbear" hover over his fireside? Are we all for our dear ones' sakes, ready to travel the twain mile of sacrifice?

Are we ready to do for our dear ones what I sa noble friend of mine do for his helpless, tongue-tied, mentally beclouded wife, who, a few months ago, w to her heavenly rest. This gentleman, at the tim knew him, had passed his three-score years and t His wife had a fatal disease creeping over her that rendering her more helpless every day. Instead of old gentleman leaving her at home to be cared for servants, he waited on her as gallantly and devote as though she were a young girl. He cut for her food at table. When he had guests, she was alw by his side to eat with them. When she spilt her of coffee, as she sometimes did, he would not apolog to us, but sweetly say to her, "Never mind, Jenn never mind. It is all right." When we went out hear one of the greatest singers in the world, he to her along, because, even in her physical and men weakness, she always loved music. Then he would s to me: "Ah, if you only had known her when she w well! I can never be too good to her for what she l been to me." Yes, in the home, we should never f get what our dear ones have done for us. They ha traveled the twain mile often enough for us. Shall not travel the tw in mile for them?

Mutual Helpfulness

Christ's command applies also to mercantile and p fessional life. Every man, to a greater or less exte is, or ought to be a servant. As a clerk, he should a servant to his employer. As a physician, he shou be a servant to his patients. As a lawyer, he should a servant to his clients. As a merchant he should be servant to his customers. As a professor, he should a servant to his students. As a scientist, he should be servant to his investigations. Now, the man in p fessional or business life, who works for money alo and who is willing to do only what he is paid to do a nothing more, is very foolish. He is looking at succ through the wrong end of a telescope. It is only wh a man works for the love of work, and not for mone that we can say a happy man is trudging along t highway of true success.

One day, a young artist called upon Audubon, t great naturalist, and showed some drawings to hi Audubon looked at these drawings a moment. Th he said: "I like those drawings very much, but th are not true. You have painted the legs of this pa tridge nicely, except in one respect. The scales a exact in shape and color, but you have not arrang them correctly as to numbers. Now, upon this upp ridge of the partridge's leg, there are just so ma scales. You have painted too many. Examine t legs of a thousand partridges, and you will find t scales always the same in number." Then Audub said: "Young man, it is only when you become wedd to your work—body, mind and soul—that you w make a success out of it. You must be willing work day in and day out, week in and week out, ye in and year out, to investigate to the minutest deta otherwise you can never master it. When you wo for science, you must work entirely above the idea mercenary remuneration. You must work for love."

Patience in Misfortune

Did not John James Audubon practice his own teac ings? For years and years and years, with gun in o hand and portfolio in the other hand, he wandere through the Western forests, seeking the haunts of t American birds, to reproduce their likenesses in h portfolios. After years of work, he went to Philade phia with the results of his labor. He was compell to leave the city for a few weeks, and when he retur ed he found that the rats had entirely destroyed t results of a decade of labor. The precious portfolio which contained the delineations of over one thousan rare birds, were forever ruined. His portfolios we forever destroyed, as the manuscript of The French Re olution of Thomas Carlyle was burned by an ignora servant, who threw it into the fire as worthless pape when she was sent into the study of the friend to who he had lent it, to clean up. So great was the shock i Audubon's case, that at first he was flung upon a bed sickness, where, for weeks, he hovered between life an death. Then he arose and went back to the forest. H nted up his old friends, the birds. He spent three re long, weary years reproducing what the rats had de nests of. And he did all this for the love of ence; for during Audubon's lifetime, his printed oks hardly paid for the cost of the printing.

What is true in reference to science and professional e, is equally true in business. The young man who kes a success in business is the one who makes his ployer's interests his own. It is not the young man o simply does what he is told to, who is promoted in e store. It is not the young man who works with his es upon the clock, ready to drop his tools at the first oke of the bell, who becomes the foreman in the fac-y. It is the young man who is a perfect glutton for rk, who finally sits in the glass office. It is the ung man who is willing to do what he is not asked to , and what other clerks are unwilling to do, who tally gets the promotion. In other words, the suc-sful man in the mercantile world is the successful n in the scientific or the professional world—the man o for others is ready to travel the twain mile.

A Painter's Opportunity

Oh, the neglected opportunities of business, to which ne of us shut our eyes! These neglected opportuni-s are lying about, despised, everywhere around us. e story is told that one day a couple of humorists were ndering through the Zoological Gardens of London. hile there they saw the carcass of a huge lion being gged from its cage. In a spirit of fun they bought and sent the dead lion as a joke to their friend, Sir win Landseer. It arrived at the great artist's house ly one morning. The servant, in amazement, went d awoke his master to ask him what he should do h it. Landseer at once dressed and went down to e it. He stood a moment and looked at the huge dy. Then he said, "Bring it into my study." They ried it in. Then Landseer took up his brush and gan to paint. He painted that dead lion in the rdst of a great expanse of sand. He called the pic-re the "Desert." It became his most famous master-pce. The model which his friends tossed aside as a ke he took and made out of it a stepping-stone to a one. So in professional, as well as in mercantile e, there are opportunities lying about us everywhere. we grasp them in the love of work; if we sacrifice them, even though at the time they may seem to mount to naught, our "dead lions" will become ving lions." When a man works for love, then a n like Sir Edwin Landseer will make everything touches redound to his own success.

But there is another authority that has a right to opœna your time and your sacrifice, just as Cæsar's urier had a right to compel the Hebrew to protect him when he was carrying the royal message over the Judean hills. This authority is the Church. It has a right to come to you in the home, in the store, anywhere you may be, and say: "God wants your money. God wants your time. God wants your personal sacrifices. Come with me for at least one mile." Now Christ says: "In the name of the Church, you should not only be willing to go one mile for God's Church; you should be willing to go the twain mile." Yet, how few people are willing to give up their money and time and personal sacrifices for the Church of God as they ought.

You seem to have time for almost every other line of work on earth but that of the Church. I go to you to-day and say: "Mrs. So-and-So, I do wish you would come and work in our Sunday School. I have one of the finest classes of girls you ever saw. There are almost twenty girls in it. They are just at the critical age of life. If we can only hold them for five or six years longer, they will make grand workers for God. But they must have the right kind of a teacher. Will you come?" And inevitably, I hear an answer something like this: "Oh, I can't come. That means I will have to get up early Sunday morning and always be there. You had better ask some one else who can be more faithful and better fitted for that work than I." And so I am put off from getting the right kind of teachers for my Sunday School, just as nearly all pastors and Sunday School superintendents are put off. The average church members are willing to go the first mile for God in the church. They are ready to attend Sunday morning service; that is, if they can come in late and leave as soon as the benediction is pronounced; but they are not willing to go the twain mile. They are not willing to give whole-hearted service, consecrated service, entire service to the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ. Now, my brother, what authority should have a prior claim upon your services to the authority of the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ?

For National Purity

But I cannot close without speaking one or two words with direct reference to Cæsar's couriers. Christ is here enunciating the doctrine he preached to the Pharisees when he said: "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, as well as to God the things which are God's." Shall we not, in the best and in the truest sense, be sublimely submissive to our city, and State, and national government? And yet, when our country is calling us and needs our aid, how many of us turn deaf ears to those calls? For the peace and happiness of our dear native land, are we ready to fight its internal enemies as well as its foreign foes? Are we ready to fight the saloon and all its sinful dives, and all the evil vampires that are trying to suck out the life-blood of our social organism?

Would that, in these times of peace, we might be as true to the best interests of our nation as were our ancestors in times of war. Then it was with them no question of money. Oh, how heavily the burden of taxation rested upon them! Every loaf of bread in those war times was taxed. Every cup of coffee and tea was taxed. Then the women sewed and the men poured forth their money in rivers of gold. Not only did they give their money, but they gave their blood and their lives to save the land. Mothers brought their sons to the recruiting officers and said: "I am a woman. I cannot fight; but here are my boys, my brave boys. Take them, and let them die as sacrifices, that their country may be free." Fathers left their wives and their children. Brothers left their parents, their sisters, their sweethearts. Those brave men left these brave women and went forth to die by the tens of thousands in order

That Their Country Might be Free

Oh, ye men, in these times of peace, cannot you hear your country calling you to come to her aid, and imploring you to make the same kind of sacrifices as your ancestors made in time of war? The heroes of peace must be just as brave and just as true as were the soldiers whose bodies are now awaiting the call of the resurrection in the trenches of Bunker Hill, of Yorktown and of the Wilderness.

Thus my text has not, as some people might suppose, a literal but a figurative interpretation. It does not simply mean that you should be willing to travel with a man two thousand paces, which was double the distance of the Roman mile, but it means that in the home, the store, the church, and as an American citizen you should render unto God the very best service you can. You should sacrifice for his name, no matter how great the sacrifices may seem to be. It is said that, after one of the famous Spartan battles, a Lacedæmonian mother hailed the courier who brought the news from the front. This mother had five sons fighting in the army. "How goes the battle?" called she. "Alas," said the courier, "all thy boys are slain." The brave mother answered, "I did not ask thee how fared my boys, but how fares my country? If the battle is won all is well, no matter what has happened to my sons." So may it be with us. May we not work to find out how it shall be with us, but how it shall be with others. May we work and continue to work, not for our individual selves, but for the best interest of the home, the store, the church, the country. Then we shall be working for God and humanity. Oh, men and women, will you travel for others to-day the twain mile?

An amusing experience of travel in Mexico is ated by Mr. G. F. Paul, a correspondent, as lows: "We were sitting in the pretty little za at Oaxaca, Mexico, enjoying the refresh-g breeze from the plains of Mitla and listening the music of the military band. My nearest mpanion on the long bench was an old mining n named Foster Scurlock. He had tramped e bare, brown hills of Mexico from gulf to an, and in the course of his wanderings had en much of the rougher side of life.

"'Were you ever over along the Pacific?' asked me. 'I was through there four years o, along with a companion named McPher-n. We hadn't gone far into the mountains fore his little dun lost a shoe and went lame, e turned back. I wished a few days later t I'd gone back with him. Nothing but g strips of sand and long ridges of moun-ns, with here and there a little mesquite sh. The natives were wild as deer. When-er I would come to one of their villages ne-tenths would hide, or else run off like rab-s to the mountains. Many a time I've yed all night in one of their rickety huts hout seeing or hearing one of them. In sh a state of affairs it was a serious matter to get ything to eat. Often they would pretend they uldn't understand my words or gestures, and I would ve to go hungry. Most of them didn't seem to know e value or meaning of money, and would toss it k to me as they would pebbles.

"'One day in August I shall never forget. The sun med to burn and blind me, and then, to help it out, e sand and dust would eddy round and fill my eyes. ad ridden till the middle of the afternoon, looking in vain for a place to rest and get water. I wasn't sure of my road, either. Rounding a sharp spur of the mountains, I came in sight of a little adobe hut, with a clump of scrubby trees around it. I spurred up my pony, and in less than five minutes I swung out of the saddle and in at the front door.

"'My sudden appearance scared the woman of the house, for she dropped the rolling-pin with which she was preparing some corn for tortillas and ran back to the other door. Then she turned and stared. I pulled off my sombrero and asked her politely if she would sell me something to eat. At first she pretended she didn't understand me. Then, after a bit, she declared that she didn't have a bite of food around the place. I knew that wasn't true, for there were a dozen chickens in the yard, so I asked for huevos bien cosidos (hard boiled eggs). She reiterated with many a shake of her head, "Yo no tengo, senor" ("I have none, sir"), so that I changed my order to tortillas. But she had none, she said, and positively refused to bake any for love or money.

"'I turned and walked towards the door as if to leave, she coming along after me. Suddenly I turned, and taking out my right eye (it is a glass one), I thrust it into her hand, exclaiming: "Keep that until I get something to eat!" She dropped to her knees, and then, carefully laying the eye on the floor, she crossed herself repeatedly, saying in a penitent voice, "Santo Mio! Santo Mio." (my saint, my saint). I knew then that I would be fed. A few minutes later a couple of fowls had been stripped of their plumage, and were well on their way to the kettle. A black-eyed, straight-haired muchach sprang up from somewhere, and took my pony away to be cared for. I stretched myself out in a little bunch of shade nearby, and patiently waited for the fowls to cook. I could hear the voice of the mother from within, ordering the youngsters to be quick, and yet not break any of the cut-glass dishes.

"'The chickens were tender as quail; the eggs were cooked just right, and plenty of them; the tortillas were crisp and the frijoles comforting. After the meal was over, the remains of the repast were packed in my saddle-bags. The whole family assembled to wish me god-speed as I cantered off."

African Heathen Leaving Their Idols

KROO GIRLS IN FESTAL DRESS

By Alice M. Guernsey

"THE whole foreign missionary work of these United States," says an eminent foreign missionary, "rest upon an effective and adequate programme of home missions." The annals of missionary life and work furnish abundant proof of the statement. Young men and women, trained in the missionary schools of this country, have gone back to their native lands to tell the glad tidings of Him who cares not for race or type, but who died for all men.

Especially is this true of missionaries in Africa. A notable illustration is found in the president of "The College of West Africa," Rev. A. B. Camphor, D. D., and his capable wife. Graduates of missionary schools in the South, in charge of a church just outside of New York City, they were ready for the call received from Bishop Hartzell, and lost no time in reaching Monrovia, Liberia, the field of what promises to be their lifework.

That was nearly ten years ago. Now, many of the earnest pupils under their care are preparing to go among their people "when they are old enough and strong enough (spiritually) to withstand the practices of heathenism (writes Mrs. Camphor), and to try to teach the people something better than the witchcraft and superstitions that enslave them."

It means something to be a Christian child in Africa. In the boarding department of the college a year ago was a little Grebo girl, Bohla by name, whose mother was put to death by the "sassswood bowl," when the child was but three years of age. Her father, thinking she would die anyway, permitted her to be taken to the Mission. In the ten years that followed, he gave himself no concern about the child. Then he sent a special messenger to say that he was getting old and would like to see her before he died, and promising that if she were allowed to come to him, he would send her back. The missionaries did not feel at liberty to refuse his request, but the girl was nearly of marriageable age among the natives, and they feared he would keep her for a while and then sell her for two bullocks, some cloth and a brass kettle—the "market price" for a woman.

The two weeks she was to stay lengthened into four or more before she returned, and this was her story: Near her father's house—or hut—was one built for his idol; no one was permitted to enter this save on bended knee, and after thorough preparations by fasting and purification of the body. Within, sacrifices were performed and homage paid by prostrations and other ceremonies. So sacred was the place deemed that no one was allowed even to pass by the door of the hut without removing any burden he might be carrying on his head. They attempted to force little ten-year-old Bohla to go through these heathen ceremonies with them, but the child steadfastly refused, saying that she knew and loved Jesus, and that he was able to give her all she needed. She urged them to leave their worship of charms, their sacrifices to wooden idols, and turn to the true God. At last they saw that she could not be forced to join their practices, and for fear lest their god would take vengeance upon them, they sent her back to the Mission and the "white man's God."

Many of Dr. Camphor's students are from the Kroo tribe, living on a strip of Liberian territory, bordering on the Atlantic coast. They are, perhaps, the strongest and most hardy of all the African tribes, and are much in demand as laborers by the foreigners who trade along the coast. They have never been victims of slavery. They are easily identified by the custom of painting the top of the nose a deep blue. The men are familiarly called "Kroo boys," without reference to their years.

Kroo Town, near Monrovia, contains over two hundred houses. They have abandoned the former style of circular huts, and now place the thatched bamboo structures, quadrangular in form, on posts raised several feet above the ground. Fires are made on the floors, which are of clay, hard and well-beaten. Not a few of these dwellings are neat and cozy, bearing marks of real taste and cleanliness. The people are active and industrious. It is unfair to say that the negro, in his ancestral home, is characterized by laziness. Scores of tribes disprove the statement, as they go about their various occupations under the heat of the tropical sun, with a vigor and cheerfulness that are remarkable.

An elderly Kroo man on being asked about certain heathen customs in Kroo Town, replied: "Time past, Krooman was fool; now he eyes open a little bit; long time I fit do country fashion (take part in heathen practices); now I no do dat dis time. 'Pose we git white man book, we learn all same tudder people." This willingness to learn "all same tudder people," is shown in their appreciation of Christian teachers, their eagerness to adopt civilized habits and to learn to read and write; in their payment of taxes, reducing the number of their wives, losing faith in charms and the fetiches of their "devil doctors;" in abandoning the distinctive blue mark on their faces, diminishing their "big plays" over the dead, and their gradual loss of fear of evil spirits. Signs like these are full of encouragement, and point unerringly to a brighter and better day for dark Africa.

In passing from Cape Mount toward the interior, the traveler has the opportunity of coming in contact with three distinct African tribes—the Vey, Golah and Mendi. These have many similar customs, although differing in features and language. The Vey tribe, living nearest to civilization, has better homes and more comforts than the others. The women seem to care nothing about worship; the men, if religious at all, are Mohammedans. They will eat nothing in the way of flesh that they themselves do not kill, and they always wash their hands, and their feet and brows before partaking of a meal.

The women are very good-looking. The girls are sent to the "Greegree bush," at from nine to fifteen years of age. Here they remain for three years, under the care of the zoe or headwomen and her assistants, and are trained for womanhood. What they are taught still remains a secret; no man is allowed inside of the girls' lodge, although the girls are nearly all married before entering the lodge. On the day of their graduation, a great feast and dance is held, the girl's husband bearing the expense; he, or some one whom he reimburses, has already advanced money to the parents upon the child. If the girl should have learned to love another, as not infrequently happens, or if the husband consents to permit her to go to another, every dollar paid out by her former betrothed must be repaid by the other, then she becomes his wife.

The Golahs seem to have no religion. They will not tolerate the Mohammedan priests, because of their inconsistencies. "Do you know Jesus?" said a missionary to an old Golah woman. "No," was prompt reply; "who is he?" "He is Son of God," said the missionary. have heard of God," answered the woman, "but I don't know his Son"—t there came into her face a light as if had discovered a strange, new truth. young woman, with blow upon blow the rough rice that she was threshing, plied in answer to the same question: have heard of him, but I don't know wh the gentleman lives."

Most of the men in these tribes h more than one wife—some have as m as forty, and even a hundred. There i headwoman to look after the young wi

The President's Southern Tour

It has been said that President Roosevelt never worked harder in his life than since he started upon his trip South, and it is certain that he has never seemed happier. Enthusiastic crowds, greeted him wherever he stopped. The outpouring of people upon the streets of the cities and towns was almost unprecedented.

In all his extensive travels about the country, Mr. Roosevelt has never been more cordially received than he was in Richmond, Va. All banks, factories, stores and schools in the city were closed. Fifteen thousand school children were among those who gave the President a sincere and hearty welcome, and his speech in Capital Square was received with much enthusiasm. Luncheon was given later in Masonic Temple, where Mr. Roosevelt was seated between the Governor of Virginia and the Mayor of Richmond. In a brief speech, Mr. Roosevelt declared with great earnestness that he, as well as the men of Virginia had a claim on the kinship of fighting with Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson. The audience jumped to its feet at this statement, cheering long and loudly. At the Lee Monument, which was visited by the presidential party later, there was a large crowd, which he addressed briefly.

At Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina, Mr. and Mrs. Roosevelt were driven to the State Senate Chamber, where a reception was given. At this juncture, the President presented a loving cup to Charles McNeill, of Charlotte, as a prize for writings of Southern dialect verse. Sixty-two thousand persons had passed through the turnstiles, at the State Fair Grounds, an hour after the President's arrival there; and as many as possible gathered around the grand stand, where the President delivered a speech, after he had reviewed a parade of the State Militia. Leaving Raleigh early in the afternoon, short stops were made by the party at Durham, Greensboro, High Point, Lexington, Salisbury and Charlotte. The train left the latter place at 7 P.M., and was run during the night to Roswell, Ga. There were no scheduled stops in South Carolina, the President having visited that State early in his Administration.

The President's visit to his mother's birthplace at Roswell, Ga., was one of the pleasantest incidents of his Southern trip. It was the first time Mrs. Roosevelt had ever visited the place where Martha Bullock, his mother, was born and spent her girlhood. It was the greatest day in the history of Roswell when the President came to town. In anticipation of this visit, the citizens had built a new wagon road, two miles long, between the railroad station and the village, and the county sheriff and a dozen leading citizens met the President and Mrs. Roosevelt at the station and escorted them over the new road to Roswell. There is but one street in the little town, at the extreme end of which stands Bullock Hall, where Martha Bullock was born, and where she was married to the President's father. The house is a stately, white-pillared old mansion, surrounded by trees, and on the broad portico stood the present owners of the place, Mr. J. B. Wing and his wife, to welcome the President. A number of the old servants and their descendants still live at the Hall, Old "Mom Grace," "Daddy Luke" and "Aunt Charlotte," being among the former. The President and his wife shook hands with them as they entered the house, and had a kindly word for each. Mr. Roosevelt asked a number of questions, showing he still held in tender remembrance the things his mother had told him about the place. The big bed of violets, and the well that was dug, but where water refused to come for so long that the excavation was used for cold storage, were pointed out to him. After Mr. Roosevelt and his wife had visited every room in the house, he requested that a photograph be taken of himself and Mrs. Roosevelt standing on the porch surrounded by the old family servants.

In the group (front row) are three old servants of the Bullock family, viz: (1) "Mom Grace," (2) "Daddy Luke," and (3) "Aunt Charlotte." The remainder includes the present occupant, Mr. J. B. Wing, his family, Miss Ward, Postmistress, Senator Clay, Rev. Wm. Baker, etc.

Said the President, in a speech to the Roswellians, "You can have no idea how much it means to me to come to Roswell, the home of my mother and my mother's people, and to see the spot which I already know so well from what my mother told me. It has been exactly as if I were revisiting some old place of my childhood. . . . I wish I could spend hours here to see the different places about which I have heard all kinds of incidents. All these anecdotes, looking back, I can now see taught me enormous lessons; and perhaps all the more because they were not intended to teach anything."

President Roosevelt Addressing the Crowds From the Rear of his Train

At the close of his speech Mr. Roosevelt drove to the Presbyterian Church and stood with his wife in the Bullock pew, while the aged pastor said a brief prayer and pronounced a benediction upon the visitors.

An unusual incident occurred during the President's visit to Roswell. Hearing that one of his mother's bridesmaids was still living at her home in the town, and that she had her own ideas about the etiquette of the occasion, the President waived precedent and called upon the old lady, who was evidently expecting him. She was dressed in rich silk and old laces, and received the President of the United States with old-time stateliness of manner, which, however, soon gave way to a more affectionate greeting, when, laying her hand lovingly on his shoulder, the old lady said, "So this is Theodore. I am very glad to see you, Theodore." The President responded in hearty fashion, telling his hostess how pleased he was to meet his mother's old friend.

Leaving Roswell the party arrived at Atlanta, Ga., where a large delegation of citizens awaited at the station the arrival of the train. The streets through which the party was driven were lined with people, enthusiastic in demonstrations of welcome. During a drive of two miles the President stood in the carriage until the end of the journey, lifting his hat and bowing to the cheering crowds. At the Fair Grounds, where he was to speak, there was a perfect whirlwind of excitement among the thousands gathered there.

Shortly before leaving Atlanta a special delegation of leading citizens were received in the President's private car at his invitation, in order that he might express to them that he had just spent eight of the happiest hours of his life. "I think you cannot help seeing what a fine time I have had," said he, "and I shall never forget it." The reply came promptly. "We consider you a Georgian by birth, Mr. President. You are one of us, and we love you because of your honesty, and your courage to do what you think is right."

The greater part of the President's Florida day was spent in Jacksonville. While not quite as noisy as at Atlanta, their welcome was none the less cordial. An interesting feature was the meeting by the President of some of the men whom he had known on the occasion of his first visit, when he was here as Lieut.-Colonel of the "Rough Riders" in 1898, at the outbreak of the Spanish War. As the President's carriage passed through some of the principal streets, the police had hard work to keep the multitude back. Luncheon was served at the Board of Trade. In his address there, when he declared that no man was fit to be President who was merely the representative of one section of the country, the people leaped to their feet, and cheered for two minutes.

At St. Augustine, a brilliant illumination accentuated the natural beauties of the ancient town. Every palmetto shrub and hedge along the streets leading from the railway station to the hotel was lighted up by red fire or colored electric lamps. From verandas and large trees hung thousands of Japanese lanterns. At the old gates the President received the key of the city from the hands of a little girl. Sunday was spent very quietly; the visitors attending service at the Memorial Presbyterian Church.

In Birmingham, Ala., the crush was so great that the police were unable to cope with the crowd of humanity, and the situation at times seemed almost dangerous, as thousands of men and women swarmed around the President's carriage. It took thirty minutes to drive half a mile to the Fair Grounds, where the President was to speak. When the Park was reached, Mr. Roosevelt found himself facing not fewer than 30,000 people, to whom he spoke at length, saying that Alabama had made a splendid record since the close of the Civil War. In all his addresses before these immense Southern audiences, the President has reiterated the gospel of civic

The President's Tour

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S Southern tour has been productive of much that is inspiring to the whole country. It has demonstrated beyond all doubt that the ancient resentment has passed away, and that a new era of good feeling has dawned upon North and South. Mr. Roosevelt has gone into the very heart of Dixie, and has been welcomed with a cordiality and enthusiasm that have shown how completely the lines of political division can be swept aside in one common patriotic impulse. The traditional courtesy of the South has been everywhere in evidence. He has visited schools, colleges, and other institutions, met civic authorities, boards of trade, governors and private citizens—the latter in such multitudes as have seldom been witnessed—and the greetings accorded him have been hearty and arousing. Indeed, there is a picturesque warmth and fervor about Southern hospitality, a charm and flavor peculiarly its own, which the North can hardly equal and never surpass. Never has this gracious hospitality flowed more freely than when it went out to this disguished son of a Southern mother, to whom all hearts opened as to one of their own blood and kindred.

It was a tribute no less to Theodore Roosevelt, the man, than to the President of the whole nation. Our Southern friends have a wholesome love of manly courage, of sturdy honesty, of inflexible purpose. They admire vigor and strenuosity much, but character more. They place a distinctive value upon high ideals. They respect one who holds the general good constantly in view, and who has the courage to speak to them of their faults as well as their virtues, yet with such rare tact as to make offense impossible; one who would win by blunt truth spoken in candor and kindness, rather than by fair speeches, full of shallow compliments.

We are glad that Theodore Roosevelt went South. It is a good thing occasionally to look away beyond political and even official lines, deep into the hearts of men, and we believe that these great gatherings that marked the Southern tour were illuminative in this respect. They have helped the two great sections of our country to understand each other better, to respect each other more, and to recognize more clearly than ever the fraternal nature of that indissoluble bond which unites us as a nation, pressing forward under divine guidance to a common destiny.

Life Insurance Management

VERY disquieting are the revelations now being made at the Legislative Investigation, in New York, of the reckless extravagance, and the misuse of funds, by the officers of the great life insurance companies. It has long been known that the insurance business was immensely profitable. The policy-holder was content that it should be so. He felt all the stronger assurance that the company would fulfil its obligations to his wife and children, from knowing that a great capital was being accumulated, and that the corporation was rich. The thought may have crossed his mind that there was no need for excessive profits; that it would be a wise and kindly act on the company's part, to use some of its accumulated reserve to reduce the premiums he sometimes found it hard to pay. But, after all, security was the chief concern, and the ability of the company to keep its promises was a source of satisfaction.

Now, however, there are disclosures of extravagance that are positively alarming. It has been elicited by this legislative investigation that enormous salaries are being paid to men who know very little of the companies' business, and that in one instance the salary paid is no less than twenty times that paid in Berlin for the same kind of work. It has also been disclosed that the funds are being used for political and other improper purposes, that nepotism and favoritism pervade the boards, and that there is crookedness and improper influence existing in the investment of the surplus. It is true that in no case is there any sign of danger about the solvency of these concerns. The profits have been so enormous, that even the reckless waste of money that has been confessed, has not impaired the power of the companies to fulfil their obligations. But this kind of management cannot go on indefinitely without bringing on a collapse. There is a limit even to the resources of an insurance company, while there appears to be no limit to the greed of its officers.

Legislative action will doubtless result from the investigation. That it will be opposed by the men who have increased their fortunes by the employment of the accumulated capital of the companies, may be expected, but there must be no hesitancy on the part of the legislators. Stringent laws must be passed, which will make such wrongdoing as that now disclosed, impossible in the future. Embezzlement, under whatever specious names it may be concealed, must be stopped. For the sake of the vast army of the policy holders, measures must be taken to prevent the wicked waste of their money, otherwise the practice of life insurance, the most unselfish thing a man does, will receive a check that will be bad for the community.

Still further, there needs to be a toning up of the moral sense of the financiers. It ought to be made impossible for men whose perceptions of right and wrong are blunted, to climb to the head of great corporations. There must be more care in the election of officers, and they must be made strictly accountable for the proper use of the funds of which they are appointed guardians. There is need of more conscience in the men who undertake this responsible office; a realization of the iniquity of robbing the widow and the orphan, or of permitting them to be robbed; a recollection of the fact, that though punishment for such wrongs may be escaped in this world, there is a righteous Judge who will surely hold the wrongdoer to a strict account.

India's Thanksgiving

IN a recent issue we printed a cablegram sent by the proprietor of this paper to the Secretary of our Orphan Work in India, in reply to an appeal from the missionaries for an extension of orphan support. That dispatch, which guaranteed continued support for another year of all orphans under fourteen years of age, and which announced the sending of the first three months' remittance of $15,000, has carried gladness into every mission camp in India.

The Rev. Frederick Wood, Secretary of the Orphan Support Committee, has forwarded to us some of the many expressions from missionary letters and telegrams in acknowledgment of the good news. As these belong equally to every contributor to the India work, we feel justified in quoting some of them here:

"This is glorious good news! By their help towards the support of the children, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund and the contributors are doing a great work for this country. What we missionaries think of it all, and the gratitude we feel, is beyond all expression."

"Kindly convey to all contributors our heartfelt thanks for their kind efforts on behalf of our children. May God bless and reward those who are doing this work."

"We all want to thank Dr. Klopsch and his readers for still continuing to help so generously. I am sure not only the famine orphans will rise up and call them blessed, but we missionaries who are already overburdened, will join heartily with them in re-echoing this sentiment far and wide."

"I am gratefully delighted to learn that Dr. Klopsch has definitely decided to continue the support of all THE CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans for another year at least. We missionaries owe a great deal to him and to the noble men and women associated with him in this great enterprise."

We are grateful to have been the channel through which this magnificent benevolence, made possible only by the golden-hearted generosity of thousands of the readers of this paper, has done such royal service for Christ and humanity in India. It is their work and to them justly belongs this recognition.

National Righteousness

A CORRESPONDENT writes to inquire:

What is National righteousness? Is it a meaningless phrase in this age of the world, or does it actually exist? Where is there one nation, nominally Christian or Pagan, that can truthfully be said to be a righteous nation?

Righteousness is the quality of being right, not merely legally, but morally right. It is something higher than a simple obedience to statute law; indeed, an individual or a nation may act within the written law and in literal compliance with it, and yet be grossly unjust and wickedly unrighteous. History, ancient and modern, is full of such instances. The righteousness which "exalteth a nation"—and which was probably as rare when the Proverbs were written as it is to-day—con ts of a reverent recognition of the Divine Sovereignty id a willing obedience to the higher moral law in ie conduct of public affairs. Truth, honor and justice ll characterize the domestic and foreign policy of su a nation. Its rulers, its statesmen, and all who hold u- thority, will have continually in view the worthy an i- tion to preserve the national good name. Such a na n is in the direct line of progress and blessing.

Perhaps, after all, no better answer can be give o our correspondent's question than that which the pro et Micah, in his time, gave to those who enquired of m how they might know and follow the righteousnes of the Lord. "He hath showed thee, Oh man, wha s good," replied the prophet, "and what doth the I d require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, d to walk humbly with thy God?" And this, in its y highest sense and interpretation, is national righteousn s.

A Plea For the Unfortunat

THE Bowery is not as comfortable now as it was d r- ing the summer. The weather is cold, the c n are dreary, and 30,000 homeless men and boys are s r- ering as they wander to and fro, hoping somehow or other to secure employment. They have come from e country to the metropolis, expecting to find their serv s in immediate demand. They were disappointed. Ev y day their chance lessens, for every day they look es inviting. When they arrived, their clothes were in g d shape, they themselves were clean and neat, and ful of hope. As time wore on, the clothes wore out, and n , thinly clad, chilled to the bone, discouraged and p- spondent, they hardly dare apply for a position o frequent has been their disappointment. Thanksgiv g is drawing nigh, and while millions are thanking d for bounties and blessings bestowed, these poor un- tunates are doomed to walk the street, homeless, fri l- less, cold and hungry, unless we come to their rescu .

For twenty-seven years the Bowery Mission has n er yet failed to open wide its hospitable doors on this - casion, and to welcome every homeless and friend s man or boy that presented himself. And again prep r- ations are under way on a most extensive scale to b g a ray of sunshine into the lives of these unfortuna s. We can seat 500 at a time, and in half an hour give th n a substantial turkey dinner and a bowl of steaming, a- grant coffee, and repeat the performance as long as e applicants continue to come. And while they eat we k to them of home and parents and friends and Hea n, and thus nourish them physically and spiritually.

Our country has been prospered this year in a la er measure than ever before in all its experience. God as given unto us crops and prosperity beyond our m st sanguine expectations. Let us give a share to th e less fortunate, and encourage them to hold out u il a turn comes for the better.

You can and will help, I am sure, to bring a li e sunshine into the lives of these poor men and boys, d THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will do its level best to m e the very most of what you give. Send along your c- tribution. Send it soon, and the consciousness that u have helped some unfortunate brother will sweeten d brighten your own Thanksgiving, and cause you to - joice that in a measure you are a co-worker with I m who came to seek and to save the lost.

Send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, N w York City, your remittance for the Thanksgiving din r to the men and boys of the Bowery, and for basket f food for the poor and destitute families of the teneme s, and we will acknowledge your contribution in our colu n. Later on, you will hear the welcome words, "Come, e blessed of my Father, and inherit the kingdom p- pared for you from the foundation of the world, f I was an hungered and ye fed me." And you will inqu e, "When saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee?" and e that sitteth on the throne will reply: "Inasmuch as e have done it unto one of the least of these, my breth n, ye have done it unto Me."

Is Consumption Curable?

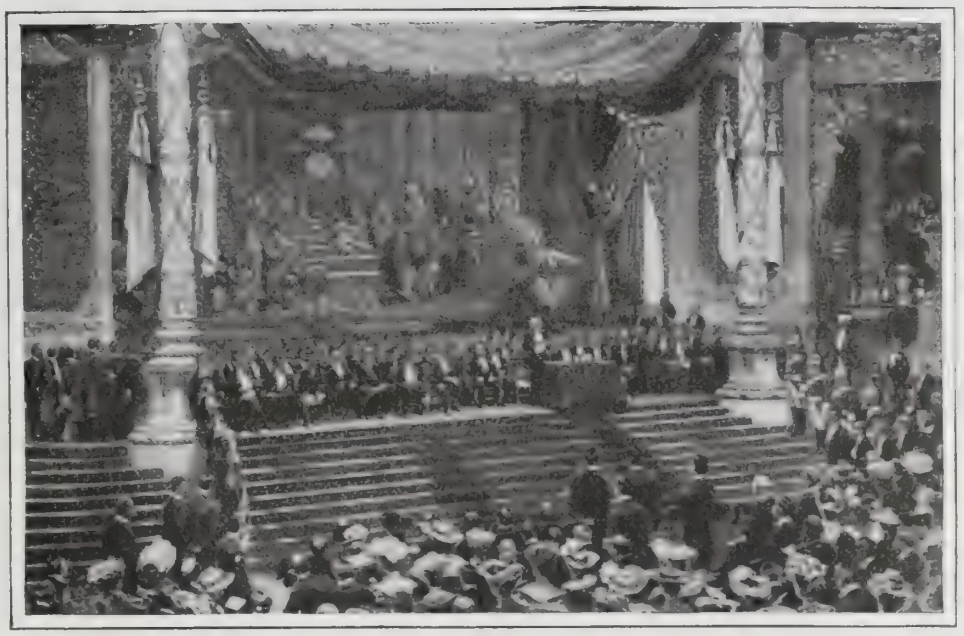
Prof. Von Behring

HOW many families there are, the world over, to whom the answer to this question involves the most intense anxiety! Some years ago, hopes were raised by Prof. Koch, that a cure had been discovered, but they soon faded, and consumption fell back again into the category of incurable diseases. Now again there is a faint hope, not very definite and not very strong, but as it comes from the highest source, and is so modestly stated, there is encouragement in it. It was announced at the great Tuberculosis Congress, held recently in Paris. At the sessions of the Congress, one doctor after another rose to explain what he had done, the remedies he had applied, and his own theory of treatment. There had been discussions on the question of isolating the patient, on the effect of the mountain air treatment, on the effect of alcoholism in producing the disease and on the application of the Roentgen rays. But on the last day of the Congress, all these topics were thrown in the shade by the announcement of Professor Von Behring, the famous German savant, that he had discovered a new method of treating the disease, which he believed would prove effective.

Prof. Von Behring is the discoverer of the antitoxin cure for diphtheria, a mode of treatment which has saved thousands of lives. He is director of the Hygienic Institute at Strassburg, in Germany. He was raised to the rank of Privy Councillor by the Emperor, as a recognition of the eminent services he had rendered to the cause of medical science. He is fifty-two years of age, and has held many high and honorable positions in the medical service of the army and in the colleges of Germany. His announcement was therefore received with the greatest respect by the members of the Congress. It recalled the greatest statement he made in 1891, when the antitoxin discovery, which has made his name famous in every land, was in its initial stage.

The nature of Dr. Von Behring's treatment is difficult for the non-professional mind to understand, and it is, moreover, as the eminent discoverer acknowledged, not yet fully developed. It is based on the germ theory discovered by Dr. Koch. It appears to be certain now that the disease is produced by the bacillus that he identified. The problem of cure is therefore narrowed down to some method of destroying these bacilli or repairing their ravages. Two courses are open to the physician. One is to improve the general health and render the constitution unfit to harbor or nourish the bacilli. This is done by the fresh air and similar methods of treatment and has succeeded in cases where the disease is detected at its beginning. The other course is to inoculate the blood with some agent that will directly annihilate the bacilli. This is Professor Von Behring's plan. He is experimenting with a vaccine produced from the virus of consumption, to which he gives the name of "T. C." This, when injected into the veins, develops a principle which he names "T. X." This is not only fatal to the bacilli but renders the cells of the lungs immune from infection. His method of preparing the vaccine and administering it has not been disclosed, but in general features it follows the lines of the remedy for diphtheria. That his experiments may lead to the discovery of a cure for the dread scourge is most devoutly to be hoped. We may be sure, that if he succeeds his remedy will be used in every case in which consumption appears. There will be no reason for the reproach that is brought against sufferers from the fearful scourge of sin, of neglecting the means of cure.

Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered? (Jer. 8: 22).



A Session of the Tuberculosis Congress, Recently Held in Paris

Russian Unrest

A condition bordering on anarchy has prevailed in Russia during the past two weeks. The whole army of labor is affected, and there are general strikes of many trades in several cities. Reports of disorder come from St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw, Kiev, Kharkov, Saratov, and other large centres. So complete has been the strike on the railroads, that for several days Moscow was completely cut off from communication and the only way out of St. Petersburg was by sea. The publication of the daily newspapers was also suspended. There was also danger of starvation, for neither meat nor provisions in sufficient quantities could be brought in. Coal and wood also became scarce. One trade after another joined in the strike, until at latest reports there are more than a million men out of work. The ostensible demand is for higher wages, but it is evident that the causes are more political than economic. It is an outbreak against the government and the bureaucracy by which it is administered. The most dangerous feature is that the loafers and criminals who hope to gain loot by the disorder are taking part, and have none of the conscientious scruples that restrain the self-respecting working man. There are reports that the Imperial Family have taken alarm, and are preparing for flight. It is, however, less against the Czar, than against his relatives and the nobles, that popular animosity is directed. But if the rising should develop into revolution, he might be sacrificed with the others. The only dependence of the regime is on the loyalty of the army. At the beginning of the trouble the soldiers were ordered not to fire on orderly meetings. They were, however, permitted to use their long whips and bludgeons. It is now announced that ball cartridges will be used and that there will be no mercy shown. M. Witte has been placed at the head of affairs and a constitution has been promised, but the leaders say that promises will not satisfy them now. Concessions which, a few weeks ago, would have been gladly welcomed, are now despised, and there seems no prospect but revolution and anarchy. The people, long patient under the oppression of the aristocrats, appear now to have lost control of themselves, as in the time of which the prophet wrote:

Behold, against this family do I devise an evil, from which ye shall not remove your necks; neither shall ye go haughtily: for this time is evil (Micah 2: 3).

Scripture on Shoes

A remarkable discovery has been made in Eastern Turkestan. Professor Bloomfield, of Johns Hopkins University, has received a report that German scientists, delving in the ruins of a city near Turpan, within the boundaries of China, found a quantity of old shoes among the relics. They had been made, and in some instances repaired, with a peculiar kind of kid which bore strange marks. When these markings were examined they were found to be writing in early Syriac characters. They have been submitted to Oriental scholars, who, having deciphered them, say that they are Biblical extracts, combined with parables, myths and stories of Oriental religions. Apparently the kid had formed part of some books dealing with the beliefs of the world at that time. It is supposed, from the shape of the characters, that they belong to the third or fourth centuries of our era. A further search led to the discovery of ten layers of the writings, which are now being examined. Professor Bloomfield thinks that this discovery may give the clue to the mystery of the incorporation of Christian ideas and Biblical incidents in the literature of the East. It is evident that whatever value these writings may have had in the estimation of the collector they had very little in the eyes of the shoemaker, who valued them only for the sake of the kid on which they were written. There were some others of that time, as there are in all ages, who thus turn spiritual truth to base uses.

Through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you (II. Peter 2: 3).

A Stranger in Town

New York had a visitor last week who attracted much attention. It was Hadji Abdullahi Sadik Pasha, special envoy from Menelik, King of Abyssinia. He was clad in a long lavender mantle, specially conferred upon him by his king as a mark of distinction. Around his chest was a tunic of many colors, glorious with gold lace, and on his head was a turban of purple and gold silk. His appearance caused a sensation in Wall Street, whither he went to call upon a gentleman who had traveled in Abyssinia and had made his acquaintance. He did not stay there long, but went on a tour through the city. Nothing impressed him so much as the height of the office buildings. "What happens," he asked, "when they fall?" He was told that they did not fall, "but," he shrewdly observed, "they must fall some time." There were other sights that excited his wonder, but he reverted to the high buildings. He had a strong desire to ascend to the summit of the highest, that he might pray there. He was much perturbed by the speed with which the elevator carried him up. He had never, he said, traveled in that kind of conveyance before. Arriving on the roof, he spent some time in prayer, with his face turned to the East. After his descent, he was taken as a contrast on a trip through the subway and was again distressed by the speed. He said he was not in any hurry and could not understand the need of so much rush. He proposes, after inspecting New York, to travel through the country. He has not come on diplomatic business, but for observation and instruction. It may be hoped that his tour will impress him not only with the wealth and activity of the country, but with the religion which is the real basis of its prosperity.

Righteousness exalteth a nation (Prov. 14: 34).

"TAKE IT TO THE LORD IN PRAYER"

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

AMONG the angels, it seems, there are groups set apart for special service—as the angel of deliverance (Ex. 33: 32; the angels of death (II Sam. 24: 16); angels who have charge of God's little ones (Matt. 18: 10; angels who are commissioned to carry answers to prayer (Dan. 9: 23). In the case of Daniel, the angel was sent from heaven at the very beginning of his prayer, with the answer which he desired. But Nehemiah had to pray for about four months before the answer came. All that time Nehemiah waited, not because there was something amiss in his prayer, not because God was unwilling to hear him or indifferent to his request; but the soul of Nehemiah needed to ripen, that he might be able to carry out the thing he desired to do.

Nehemiah yearned to go to Jerusalem and help his people, the Jews, who were in dire distress; their walls broken down and the gates of their city burned, and they themselves, the butt of their enemies. All of this, and more, Nehemiah learned from his brother Hanani, and certain men of Judah, who had come to Babylon, probably seeking aid from the Jews, who had voluntarily chosen to remain in exile, rather than to return to Jerusalem. (Zerubbabel had returned with the first party eighty years before, and Ezra with another party thirteen years before.) The evil report stirred the heart of Nehemiah and aroused his patriotism. That he held high official position at the Persian court did not diminish his desire to go. But he was not free to do so. He must get the consent of King Artaxerxes. That "God would grant him mercy in the sight of this man," was the burden of his prayer. It was no small thing to ask, for Persian kings were noted for hedging themselves about with a divinity that made common mortals, and even uncommon ones, tremble. It was even considered worthy of death for a servant or officer to show sadness or depression before a Persian king.

How Nehemiah must have trembled, therefore, when Artaxerxes said to him one day: "Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? This is nothing else but sorrow of heart." Indeed, Nehemiah tells us that he "was very sore afraid." And he told the king what his desire was: to return to Jerusalem to help his people build the wall of their city, and also to establish them in the Word of God. The angel of prayer was there, though unseen, and gently touched the heart of the austere king, and the "mercy" was granted to Nehemiah for which he had prayed to God, for the king gave him leave to go.

"The King said: For what dost thou make request? So I prayed to the God of heaven"

Illustration and Application

1. The Man Behind the Prayer. More important than the words of a prayer is the man behind the prayer—the bow that sends the arrow up, or from which it falls flat to the ground, if he be not true. What sort of a man was this Nehemiah? (1) He was unselfish, or he would not have troubled himself about the condition of his fellow Jews behind the broken wall and burned gate of Jerusalem, when himself so securely comfortable as the cup-bearer of the great king. (2) Nehemiah was a man of deep sympathy—which led him out of self towards others, and won others to him and to God—an important element in every soul-winner. (3) Nehemiah was also a man of great perseverance. It has been well said that "the perseverance of the saints" usually gives up before the greater perseverance of sinners, but it did not in Nehemiah's case. There was also in his character: (4) heroism, (5) singleness of eye, (6) unwavering of faith, (7) the spirit of habitual prayer, and (8) ardent devotion. These qualities were developed in spite of an adverse environment, in the fetid atmosphere of a heathen palace; and in such places grew also the virtues of Joseph, Moses, Daniel, Obadiah, Mordecai and "the saints of Nero's household." Surely, if such virtues could grow in such a place, there is no place in which we cannot live the life of prayer and Christian service.

2. Prayer is Often Prompted by Sorrow. To Peter, walking to Christ on the waves, "sinking times were the praying times." It was then he cried: "Lord, save me!" But Nehemiah's anxiety was less selfish. The sorrow that drove him to prayer was the condition of his brethren in broken-down Jerusalem. There is usually abundant sympathy when our fellows are in physical danger or distress. Little Harry, who had been running up and down the beach with ringing laughter, accompanied by his dogs, Gyp and Toby, suddenly put on an earnest look and ran at his utmost speed. "Auntie," he exclaimed, "there's a chap on the big buoy yonder helloing and waving his arms, and no one seems to hear." "Run to the Hotel Cyprian, and ask them to telephone over to the harbor for a lifeboat." Henry ran, but there was no telephone at the Cyprian. On he ran to another hotel, and the telephone call was sent, and he soon had the joy of seeing a pilot-boat speeding to the buoy, and the stranded swimmer, who had gone beyond his strength, was saved. Why is it that even Christians seldom show equal anxiety about stranded souls, even of their own households, for whom we should pray with strong crying and tears?

3. Prayer Includes Confession. Prayer is like the gate, where a child meets father at evening, to tell him of the sorrows and joys of the day. [Let the gate be made on a large sheet of manila paper, with words, all covered by strips lightly pinned on, and uncover them one by one.] Prayer is to "Our Father," in the name of "Jesus," through the aid of the "Holy Spirit," and includes "Praising," "Confessing," "Asking," with unspoken "Submission," "Faith," "Love," "Obedience," as the deeper element in which we may "pray without ceasing," and be "instant in prayer." A little girl, whose father had once been very active in the work of the church, but had ceased to work or pray, climbed on his lap one day, and said: "Papa, is God dead?" "Why, no, my child, why do you ask?" "O you never talk to him any more, and I thought perhaps he was dead."

It is strange, indeed, that any human father can neglect to lead his children to the Heavenly Father. As King Artaxerxes saw Nehemiah's prayer in his sad face; so in the peril and fear which this discovery brought to Nehemiah, God saw and heard his unspoken prayer for help. Once Jesus prayed by a sigh: "He sighed and looked up to heaven." Not a single fault of Nehemiah's is named in the Bible; but in his prayer, like other good men, he showed a sense of sin, and confessed it before God. Indeed, good men are more ready to confess their sins than the most wicked, who often miss salvation, because they excuse instead of confessing their sins. The following illustrates what may be learned in almost any prison, that few of the most guilty are willing to confess their sins.

A good many years ago, a German prince visited the arsenal of Toulon, where a large number of men, condemned for different crimes, were working as galley slaves. The prince was told that, in compliment to his visit, he was allowed to free one of them. He inquired of first one, then another, the cause of his punishment. Each declared that he had been unjustly accused, or wrongfully arrested, till he came to a fine big man with a sorrowful face. He confessed what he had done, and said, "I acknowledge it, it grieves me, and I deplore it. I deserve to be broken on the wheel." Turning to the officers, the prince exclaimed, "This is the man for whose release I make request. He is the first I have found who feels he has done wrong and has anything to be forgiven" Does God ever have to say to us, "Behold, I will plead with thee, because thou sayest, I have not sinned?" (Jer. 2: 35).

As when Daniel was "praying and c fessing," an angel came, even before had reached the amen, and said: "' prayer is heard, and thou art greatly loved," so while we are praying and c fessing God's promise comes to assure "If we confess our sins he is faithful just to forgive us our sins and to clea us from all our unrighteousness" (I John 1: 9). have found that the very best of all texts to bring surance of pardon to all sincere penitents. It is divine absolution.

4. Prayer Should be Based on God's Promises. we abide in Christ, and his word abide in us," we s have no unanswered prayers, although there may be layed prayers and prayers answered better than asking. A good illustration of how reluctantly we cept the riches of God's promises, is afforded by story of Sir William Pynsent, of England, who queathed his large and beautiful estate to the Ear Chatham, because he "greatly admired his unselfish votion to his country." The country lawyer, wh duty it became to inform Chatham of this great quest, on arriving at the Earl's house, and asking to him, was bluntly told by the doorkeeper: "His l ship does not receive every countryman who come town." To which the lawyer replied: "If he refu to see me, it will be the worst day's work he ever d An official passing by, said he would take a mess to the Earl, but the lawyer could not see him. "I h come all the way from Somersetshire to see him," the lawyer, "and see him I must." After several r refusals, his persistency was rewarded, but the I said as he received him: am so busy with affairs of s that I can give you but th minutes." The solicitor unf ed the deed that was to m the poor statesman rich, say that the document would exp itself. Chatham, with his m on political problems, heard c a jumble of "aforesaid" "hereby," and when it through, he said: "What has this to do with me?" "D you understand that Burton F sent is yours?" "Mine!" claimed the Earl; and so at he was made to appreciate w riches had been given him in friend's last will and testam Even more difficult is it for G messengers to make those sorbed in business and politics pleasure, realize what inner ric for both worlds lie unappro ated in the "Testament," wh expresses Christ's will for us.

5. Prayer Moves Hearts Governments. Nehemiah, s tled by the king's questi "Why are you sad?" prayed fore he answered, and so ans ed wisely and won the ki heart, which is in instructive trast with the mistake of Nat who, when King David prop to build the temple, answe before praying, that he sh build, and later, had to tak back. The answer of Nehemi prayer by God's influence Artaxerxes' heart, recalls the verse that President field kissed at his inauguration: "The King's heart i the hand of the Lord as rivers of water; he turnet whithersoever he will." In this case, God turned river of royal favor toward Jerusalem.

There is a good story of how a royal mother, Qu Louise of Prussia, impressed her princely boys b lesson of two crowns that each might wear. The mot and her boys, Fritz and William, were in flight be Napoleon. At one point where they rested, F brought to his mother a handful of beautiful blue flowers. She wove a crown, and put it on the head Fritz, who was Crown Prince, saying: "There, Fr you have your first crown!" "Nay, mother," William, "you might have crowned me. Fritz does wish to be king. When we play, I am always king." mother smiled, and made him also a crown of the s flowers, and then talked to them beautifully of "crown of glory that fadeth not away." Fritz afterw became Frederick William IV. of Prussia, who, afte short reign, was succeeded at his death by William, gre father of the present Emperor, who, in recollection of mother's lesson of the two crowns, made the cornflo the Kaiser-blumen—the Emperor's flower. Let it speak to us, not alone of the heavenly crown, but of power of God to touch the heart of king and citizen child and man alike.

The bread that bringeth strength I want to give;
The water pure that bids the thirsty live;
I want to help the fainting day by day;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

I want to give the oil of joy for tears,
The faith to conquer crowding doubts and fears,
Beauty for ashes may I give alway;
I'm sure I shall not pass again this way.

OUR FAMILY CIRCLE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

An Indian Summer Wooing

MILDRED took off her spectacles, polished them carefully and put them on again. She saw no better than before. Clearly, the trouble was with her eyes, not with the glasses. Latterly, Mildred had found difficulty in threading a needle, and in reading fine print. And the light had to be very bright and very well diffused, or she could not see comfortably.

"You really ought to consult an oculist," said her neighbor at the boarding-house table. "Dr. Emmet has done wonderful things for me. Why don't you go and see him to-day? He is rapidly getting to be famous. Of course, you have heard of him."

"Oh, of course," said Mildred Anthony. She had not cared to tell the kind adviser that Archie Emmet and herself had run races, waded in brooks, and ridden on hay wagons together, when they were boy and girl, ever so many years ago. She was now a spinster of forty-five, straight, tall, elegant in appearance, but very, very poor, and he was a rich specialist of fifty. Coining money and wearing laurels, Archie Emmet was known to everybody. Mildred Anthony still retained a few of her old friends, but she had dropped out of society, and, owing to her slender income and her lack of money-making talents, she had much ado even to maintain herself at the modest boarding-house in Thirty-sixth Street, where she had the fourth story back room. When last she had met Archie, she was a beautiful girl of nineteen, the belle of a fashionable set, and he a gawky youth of twenty-four, just out of college, and ill at ease away from his books.

Mildred became desperately anxious about her eyes. They were not exactly painful, but she could not see. Specks floated in the atmosphere. Blurs came over landscapes. Type was apt to pi itself, and lines wavered as she read the books she loved. Evidently she must have assistance, and that very soon. But oculist's fees were high, and glasses made by prescription were expensive. She scanned her pocket-book wistfully, and counted her meagre stock of money. No more funds were in sight until another quarter day. Very close reckoning would be needed to keep her out of debt.

Sometimes Mildred looked back regretfully to the lavish days of her girlhood when her father's house was a palace, with open doors for all acquaintances; when the price of thing was the last thing she thought of, when financial anxiety was unknown.

She could not afford an oculist's fee for three weeks or a month, Dr. Emmet's or any one else's. But—there was the Dispensary. The poor went thither and freely received the attentions of the best physicians. There was no shame in poverty. Why should she not trample her pride under foot, and go where she could get gratuitous advice?

Mildred resisted the thought a long time. Finally, common sense won the battle. She went to the Dispensary.

Her austere black gown, tailor-made and well-fitting; her gloves worn, but scrupulously mended; her neat shoes, her felt toque with its unobtrusive trimming, all stamped her with the distinctive air of a gentlewoman. In the anteroom, she waited for her turn. When it came, she went into the presence of the doctor, timidly, yet confidently. That throbbing of the pulses that always comes when one is dreading to hear the worst, yet hoping for the best, sent the warm blood in a hot tide to her cheeks, but left her cold at the same time. Outwardly and visibly she was calm.

The doctor looked up, courteous and impassive. The next instant, his face flushed. He extended his hand.

"Why, Mildred Anthony! How good to meet you again. But, why are you here?"

"For advice, Dr. Emmet. There is something very wrong with my eyes."

Neither had expected to see the other, but the training of the thoroughbred teaches composure in every circumstance.

"I was compelled to come to the Dispensary," she explained. "I have no money. It—" she hesitated a little, "I supposed it was to be Dr. Leonard's day."

"It is Dr. Leonard's day, but he is out of town, and I am substituting for him. Mildred, I won't prescribe for you here. Come to my office, at three." His manner was imperative, and he handed her a card. "Come," he added, "for the sake of old days."

Mildred went to the office. Dr. Emmet, all professional in his scrutiny, examined her eyes, prescribed for her; then, as it was not his regular office hour, he insisted on walking home with her.

The walk was a long one. It was followed by other calls, by drives with Dr. Emmet in the park, by a swift and eager courtship. Archie Emmet had never been in love before. He had thought science his mistress and had wanted no wife to sit beside his hearth. Presently he found himself wishing nothing so much as to win Mildred, who proved hard to win. It was an Indian summer wooing, and it sped bravely on.

One morning there was a very quiet wedding in a little gray church. Dr. Emmet could not then be spared for a wedding journey. That would come next summer with the June roses. But Mildred said good-by to the boarding-house, and went with her husband, to change his stately empty mansion into the sweetest thing on earth, a real home.

Miss Alice Roosevelt(1) with Madame Oyama(2) at Tokio, Japan

Miss Alice Roosevelt has returned from her tour to the Far East, whither she accompanied the party of Secretary Taft. She is delighted with her visit. An interviewer quotes her as saying: "The things that I have seen on this trip have been very interesting and instructive as well. We were everywhere shown every attention and courtesy, and not a single disagreeable incident marred our pleasure. The gifts presented to me in various places I accepted as a compliment to my country, and not in the nature of personal tribute. Please deny for me, however, that they represent any such value or are of such a fabulous character as reported in the newspapers. There is also absolutely no foundation for the absurd story that I took a dive into a tank on board ship. Neither did I receive an offer of marriage from the Sultan of Sulu. The circulation of such nonsensical stories is the only outcome of my whole trip that I have to regret. I have had an exceptionally enjoyable time from its very inception, and have been in the best of health and spirits throughout. I am going directly to the White House."

Our illustration is from a photograph taken in Tokio, where Miss Roosevelt was the guest of Madame Oyama, the wife of the distinguished Japanese General. She is dressed in the Japanese costume. In Tokio she was received by the Emperor and Empress.

Knowing How to Play

A FRIEND wrote the other day, saying frankly that she did not know how to play. Early in life the serious aspect of everything had impressed her, and she had been forced when scarcely beyond childhood, to undertake work which taxed all her powers. The problem of poverty was oppressive, there were dear ones for whom she must toil, and so the years of her youth were spent in strenuous labor for the comfort of the aged or the sick, and for self-support. Time has gone on, as time always does. She still works day in and day out, and has only her evenings and an occasional holiday, and now her complaint is, "I can do nothing but work. I don't know how to play."

This lady is a representative of a very numerous, very worthy, and very much to be pitied class in America. Thousands and tens of thousands of us have lived such strenuous and austere lives almost from the cradle, and certainly from the schoolroom onward, that we have lost the capacity for, as well as the art of enjoying ourselves when the opportunities come. One sees this in the business man who does not know how to take a holiday, or who, retiring from active life when he has amassed a fortune, does not know what to do with his well-earned leisure. There are wives and mothers who have spent their youth and strength in labor so unremitting, that in middle age they not only do not know how to play, but actually fancy that play is wrong. Women, not a few, feel conscience-stricken when they sit down in daylight to read an amusing book, or to indulge themselves in the forty winks, which are more renovating than the uninitiated know.

Office work, factory work, any work at all, which must regularly be done away from home, as, for instance, that of the saleswoman, who is most of the time on her feet, drains the vitality of the worker to an extent not felt by those who, in their own homes, can often change their work, now sitting down, now going to another room, and again by an altered occupation, bringing a different set of muscles into exercise. A woman who has been at work all day, and who goes home only at night, is probably too weary to do much besides rest. She really ought to retire early and get what sleep she can. Yet, there is something in having, if only for a half-hour after supper, some outlet which awakens another spirit. If one have an innate fondness for reading, one can speedily get away into a lovely world of pleasure, which is akin to play. The woman who is fond of books, who can stop at a library and carry home a volume which will give her something to think of outside of herself, is more than fortunate. In town life there are social Settlements which invite the working woman to spend the early evening hours agreeably in restful rooms, and among pleasant friends. In every town and city where there is a Young Woman's Christian Association there is a social centre to which a weary worker may go, where she may find friendship, relaxation and cheer. Any resource which is entirely in contrast to the day's work is healthful. Most of all, one needs to preserve the attitude of mind in which one is willing to play, in which one is willing even to be a little frivolous, in which fun and trifles may give a passing delight.

Last of all, for the weary worker let there be this thought, that it is better farther on. Trust in God. He giveth his beloveth sleep, night by night, and strength day by day. Last of all; nay, first of all, trust the love of the heavenly Father.

A THREEFOLD CORD

The Story of a Trio of Twentieth Century Girls

BY AGNES DUNCAN

"PRISCILLA wouldn't mind this so much, if it were not for the Chesters and Arthur Field," said Anne. "The Chesters have no use for people who get into difficulties of any sort, and Arthur Field does not like women to earn money. But for Arthur, Priscilla would have gone on with her painting, I am sure."

"I'm afraid you are right. Priscilla will be no loser, though, if she have a chance to test her friends. Fair weather friends amount to very little. If Arthur Field is as superficial and shallow as you and I think him, it is well that Priscilla shall find it out now."

"I think they are engaged. If not, there is an understanding."

"Oh, has it gone so far? I am sorry."

The Chesters were school friends of Priscilla, people of large fortune and aristocratic exclusiveness. She had spent three summer vacations with them at their cottage in Maine, and while there, a year ago, had met Arthur Field, a young lawyer, who had paid her devoted attention for some months. Neither Anne nor Peggy cared for Arthur Field, and they did not like his influence on Priscilla. He never had fitted into the family life, and, though extremely polite, they never lost the feeling that it cost him an effort to be so. For their dear hard-working father he seemed to have only patronage; for their gentle mother, a condescension as if she were a child to be humored, and for the usual acquaintances and the family kindred Mr. Arthur Field had toleration. To the sharp eyes of, Peggy it appeared that he coveted Priscilla, with her distinction, charm and elegance, and wanted her for his wife; but that, once she should become his, there would be a deep dividing line between her and her people ever after. In truth, she thought Arthur Field a snob, and not good enough nor genuine enough for Priscilla Harmon. Walter Prescott, now, was cast in a nobler mold! Her cheek flushed and her dimples danced at the very mention of Walter's name.

In spite of changed conditions, of the modern girl's imperative wish to stand on her own feet, of a hundred opportunities for her activity where there used to be but one, hearts remain the same. Love still sings its sweet story, and lovers mate as of old, and the world has not lost altogether the fragrance of the rose that bloomed in Eden. Priscilla herself had no doubts about Arthur. She knew him to be shy, reserved and self-centered, but she fancied him knightly and gallant. She had not given up her miniature painting because of his disapproval, open or indirect, but because she was in love, and a girl deeply in love has little thought or room in her heart and life for lesser things. She knew that he was handicapped by a selfish mother in the background, and by limited means; she did not dream that their altered plans would affect his devotion to herself. So she went singing to her task in the laundry, and was hanging up the curtains in the back yard when, an unheard of event, Arthur Field called by on his way from his office to his luncheon.

He had been haunted all the morning by an impression of Priscilla sitting in tearful dejection in her own room, breaking her heart because her parents had gone away.

"Is Miss Priscilla at home?" he said.

Norah, red-armed, stout, disheveled, in the midst of a very radical house-cleaning, had opened the hall door. The combined efforts of the sisters three had never resulted in persuading Norah to offer a tray to visitors for their cards, nor to treat frequent callers with ceremony. She was pure gold of goodness, and had no more tact than an elephant.

"Miss Priscilla is it? She's at home. Shtep right out into the yarrd. She's hangin' up clothes."

Immaculate and natty in his business dress, well groomed, with a flower in his button-hole and a big bunch of roses in his hand, Mr. Arthur stepped out on the back veranda and beheld Priscilla, her round arms bare above the elbow, her skirts kilted up, shaking white curtains out of a basket and singing like a lark as she did so. She had never looked more fetching, more bewitching, and Arthur Field had never thought her so sweet. Two steps at a time he ran down upon the grass plot. The roses were thrown on the veranda for the moment.

"You dear!" he exclaimed. "Can't I help? Can't I hand them up to you? Can't I stay to luncheon? You'll be famished after this. Why, child, who ever taught you anything as useful as washing?"

"I never was taught housekeeping, Arthur. The knowledge of it was born in me. No, I can't invite you to luncheon. We are going to have a bite in the pantry. Come to dinner, if you like. This work will be finished before then, and I'll have time to talk with you."

"Priscilla, I bought you some roses."

"Did you? You extravagant boy! You ought not to buy roses for me. Not that I don't love them; but I can't have you wasting your money."

"I want to stay to luncheon, Priscilla."

"Well, then, come along and share my bread and butter and cold ham; it's all I have for you. The others won't be down yet. Come and picnic in the kitchen. I'll make a cup of tea for you."

"I'll put the roses in the ice-box till you are ready to see them," he said, opening the refrigerator and slipping the rarely beautiful flowers within its cool depths. "Say, Priscilla, this is a jolly kitchen. You never let me see it before. You have kept me on the fringe of the family circle, dear. It isn't fair, you know. Priscilla, I have something very serious to say to you this evening."

"And I to you," she answered gaily. Somehow a good many of her clouds had just lightly rolled away.

Among the strange problems that confront us there is nothing stranger than the ease with which people, good people, too, misunderstand one another. Arthur Field had been brought up in a home of strict integrity and very narrow means. Though he made an impression of having been born with the traditional golden spoon in his mouth, the leaden spoon came nearer reality. He was full of ambitions and hopes, and was, while in love with Priscilla, constantly drawn back from declaring its full expression, by a fear that she was disposed to extravagance and that she would never understand economy. He fitted her in his mind with Laura Chester, whose winter gowns for a winter alone cost as much as the young lawyer could make in a year. Priscilla's home-made dresses had just as much style, and Arthur took it for granted that they cost as much as those of her friend.

The unspoken doubt and unformulated suspicion of Priscilla's family had kept Arthur from appearing natural in their presence. It is very hard to seem what you do not feel if you are a genuine and sincere person, and if sensitive you respond quickly to the atmosphere around you. Arthur's neglect of Priscilla's family was due in part to the fact that he never saw more than one thing at a time. Priscilla was his lodestar, and her father, mother, and sisters were as little to him as the fireflies below, when his eyes were fixed on the sky above. The rest of the reason was a lack of early training in the politeness that includes every one about and around the family circle and in society, in the consideration which admits no courtesy.

Peggy and Anne, having finished their arrangement of rooms, came for an impromptu luncheon, just as Priscilla and Arthur were concluding theirs. They had not time to show surprise if they felt it, for there was a pull at the bell, which set the echoes to wild vibration, and instantly a loud, emphatic voice was heard in the hall. The girls looked at one another in dismay. Norah, rushing down, announced:

"Yer Cousin, Lavina Pease!"

CHAPTER III.

A COUSIN FROM THE COUNTRY

ARTHUR took a hasty leave, going out by the basement way. The girls hurried upstairs to meet Miss Lavina Pease.

She stood with bags and bundles around her, and the cabman was bringing in a good sized trunk. She paid his fare before she turned to her young relatives, and in a matter-of-fact fashion gave each a peck that answered for a kiss, remarking:

"You've received my letter, I suppose? I wrote yesterday, but I decided to come sooner than I said, for the wind might change and bring a storm. You can't place much dependence on October."

"We haven't had your letter, Cousin Lavina," said Peggy, "but we are always glad to see you. Only just now, with mother away, it won't be so pleasant for you, I am afraid."

"That's why I came. When Cousin Mary wrote that John's health was threatened, and she had to go to Europe with him, I decided on the spot to put my own convenience aside and spend the winter with you. I could not conscientiously let three young girls stay by themselves so long. There is no knowing what mistakes you might make; or you might be ill. Mary did not ask me, but that was her delicacy, as I knew very well."

"Anne," said Peggy, "take Cousin Lavina to my room, please, and make her comfortable. I'll go and see to luncheon."

"But," observed Cousin Lavina, as she went upstairs, "I can't go to the third story, child. I have a weak heart. I must have your mother's room."

"We are going to take boarders." Anne plumped the truth out with much satisfaction, for this old maid cousin was no favorite of hers.

"Take boarders!" Miss Pease fairly gasped and her face was severely disapproving. "Why, Anne Harmon, what would your father say? Well, then put me where you please. One room will do as well as another. I shall remain, and give you what assistance I can. Boarders, let me tell you, will make no end of extra work. I've taken them, summers, off and on, for twenty years, and I know. Norah'll have reason to rejoice that I'm here. I'll unpack my things after I've had something to eat."

Miss Lavina Pease was an active woman of sixty, a typical New England spinster. She always obeyed the dictates of her conscience and never cared the least bit for the opinions of others. At the same time she was extremely conventional, as she understood conventions. She belonged in a world and a generation entirely opposed to the world and generation of her young kinswomen. They would have given anything to get rid of her company at this juncture, but they were fully aware that she would not budge an inch until she was ready.

So Peggy at once dismantled her own chamber, the large back room in the third story, put it at Cousin Lavina's disposal, and crowded her own belongings into the small guest-chamber at the end of the passage, packing away what she could in the storeroom, and making the best of the situation. Her life long it was Peggy who had made the smaller sacrifices and she would go on doing so to the end. Peggy's self-denials were never paraded as virtues, and she never received credit for them except on the books of the recording angel. They were sure to be set down there.

An Observer in Utah

I HAVE lived fifteen years in Utah and have had opportunity to form a fair opinion of matters here. It is my belief that there is not a single Gentile who in his heart does not pray that Utah may be reduced to a Territory and again governed and controlled by Uncle Sam, until such time as citizens of true American sentiment are sufficiently strong numerically to clip the nails of the Mormon beast and keep them so. Gentiles can be found here in Salt Lake City who will deny these sentiments, as Peter denied the Saviour. They are mostly business men, and have a deluded belief that their business existence depends on not offending the hierarchy. But, on the other hand, there are many independent Mormons who are secretly in favor of humbling the un-American polygamous head of the church. These and the Gentiles constitute the only true American citizens of the State. All others believe as they have been taught, that the "kingdom of God" (the Mormon church), is entitled to their allegiance as the first government on earth. They, as citizens of the United States, do not deserve consideration.

It is commonly talked here that for some hidden policy, Senator Smoot has been "counseled" by the hierarchy to resign. Counseled means commanded, and if the rumor is true, he will not wait to be thrown out. His withdrawal, forced or otherwise, will not be farreaching on the local situation. The Mormon church, violator of every covenant it made to obtain statehood, is "in the saddle"—defiant, insolent and aggressive. In administration it is Asiatic. Absolutely controlling the Senators of two States, having a balance of power in two other States, and possible to name ten electoral votes, the hierarchy believes itself in a position to defy the President and the Republican majority in Congress. It made a grave mistake in permitting Smoot's candidacy and selection, and would rejoice if the effect could be overcome; but in other respects the church was never more aggressive and defiant, or so ambitious politically and commercially.

It is the opinion of close observers never was the practice of polygamy more general than it is in city and throughout the State than it is to-day. Under the so-called "sealing" subterfuge (hidden and unlicensed), we Gentiles have reason to suspect that the number of plural wives is steadily increasing. We can, of course, have no means of positively knowing, but notice an increase in the fruits of marriage in quarters where legitimate marriage is not.

It is a proposition which this Government must face, sooner or later, that Utah is not fit to be a member of the galaxy of States, and will never be, until it has been reduced to a territory, to be ruled as a national dependency, until the present hierarchy has passed away, and the church has been taught that it must forever surrender its temporal power.

When it was proposed to unseat Congressman Roberts, the cry went up that it would be establishing a dangerous precedent, and that, in fact, the House had no power to act. Yet Mr. Roberts was thrown out; and he did not "stand upon the order of his going" either. Should Congress begin proceedings to annul Utah's Statehood, the same outcry will be made; but it has the power. REX.

The Women's Campaign

In a recent speech in Newark, N. J., Mr. Hans P. Freece said:

"At the Smoot investigation in Washington, these facts were brought to light and given to the world. First, that seven of the apostles are living in polygamy. Second, Professor Tanner of the school at Logan, had recently taken a new wife. Third, the surest way of advancement for a young ecclesiast is to enter into polygamy. Fourth, Apostle Teasdale had recently married a young and beautiful girl and had set aside one of his old wives. Mormonism is not only in Utah, it is in Washington to-day; it is in every State of the Union. You men who think that Mormonism is harmless and think the question a 'chestnut,' have yet to learn its true meaning. To-day there are 1,500 Mormons in New York City. Only last Sunday, the Christian ministers of Independence, Mo., warned their congregations that it would be but a question of time ere the Mormons would control that town. In 1897 the Mormon Church numbered but one-half the Congregationalists. That year the Congregationalists added 1,200 to their numbers, the Presbyterians 1,700 the Methodists 1,900, and the Mormons added 6,300. The Mormons already have a balance of power in six of the Western States. It is the boast of the hierarchy that in a few years they will send to Washington three or four Senators."

Marian Bonsall, writing of Mormon wives, says: "There is no concealment in Utah of the continued polygamous relations of those who obeyed the divine principle before the manifesto was issued. President Smith, for instance, has his official residence in the Bee Hive House, where he lives with one wife. In four comfortable homes, not great distances apart, live four other wives. Each wife has at least one young child. At any public receptions or civil functions where Gentiles are sure to be present, President Smith is seen with only one wife. Occasionally he is known to take two, and I believe sometimes three wives to a social function where only Mormon guests are present. One of the apostles, who has eight wives I believe, has homes in several different towns. Four of them, women of culture and education, live in attractive homes in the same town. There are plural wives of prominent Mormons living in Mexico and Canada under assumed names, out of sight of the government. In small towns all over Utah there are comfortable, and frequently handsome residences, which are the homes of plural wives of well known Mormon men. In the small towns the plural wives sometimes live in the poorest little places imaginable, reduced to absolute poverty, that the husband might support other wives. A certain bishop, a fanatic on the subject of plural marriage, supports several wives in a little town in Utah. He is eighty-three years of age."

Has Dedicated 650 Churches

WABASH, Indiana, is the home of Rev. L. L. Carpenter, who has lived there for thirty-seven years. He was born in Norton, Summit County, Ohio, and was the seventh son in a family of eight children. He became a Christian at about the age of 20 and entered Bethany College in 1855, graduating in 1857. He spent four years in Fulton county, Ohio, where he baptized more than 1,000 people, and organized several churches that are still flourishing. His career has been largely that of an Evangelist and Sunday School worker. His success as an Evangelist is attested by the fact that he has received over 9,000 people into the church, in the forty-six years of his work as a preacher.

Rev. L. L. Carpenter

As a dedicator of churches he has made a wonderful record. On August 13th last, he dedicated his six hundred and fiftieth church, at Alexandria, Indiana. These six hundred and fifty churches are scattered throughout many States. They include Mission chapels and handsome costly edifices. Mr. Carpenter is also a successful money raiser. In dedicating these churches, he has raised over $2,000,000. He is now 72 years old, and stands 6 feet 3 inches high and is as straight as an arrow.

He is well known among his people as "The tall Sycamore of the Wabash."

It is sometimes said that the old preachers must be laid on the shelf, but Rev. Mr. Carpenter says: "They can't find a shelf in all Indiana long enough to put him on." He is out almost every Sunday of the year, dedicating some church. This entails upon him a great deal of traveling, but he is as vigorous as a man of 45 and stands it with remarkable fortitude. He says he expects to live many years yet to dedicate many more churches. C. A. F.

If your rugs are dirty, DIRTY through and through, send them to a cleaner. But if they are only dull from dust and soot settling upon the surface, use Ivory Soap. It will make them look like new.

DIRECTIONS.—First, thoroughly sweep, or better still, beat and shake the rug until all dust is removed. Make a stiff lather of Ivory Soap and warm water (one-half cake of Ivory will make a bucket of lather) and scrub the rug with this lather. Wipe with a clean, damp sponge. Do not use much water.

Naval Y. M. C. A. Work in the Philippines

The Naval Y. M. C. A. Building at Cavite, P. I.

IT is now six years since the Naval Y. M. C. A. was established at the Cavite Navy Yard, in the Philippines. Since that time, it has maintained comfortable and well-equipped rooms for the men of the Navy and the Marine Corps. Some idea of the activity of the work may be gathered from the following figures furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by the secretary:

Total attendance at the rooms	25,000
Number of religious meetings held	108
Attendance at these for the year	2,160
Number of Bible class sessions held	20
Attendance at these for the year	100
Educational classes	50
Sessions of Literary Society held	50
Attendance at same for the year	1,800
Number of men sleeping in dormitory	1,850
Using gymnasium	5,000
Using tennis courts	1,000
Books in Library	500
Attendance: entertainments and socials	4,200
Letters written	10,000
Magazines and papers sent to ships	6,000
Number of conversions	15

A naval building, well adapted to the needs of the new Naval Station, was erected at Olongopo Navy Yard, in August, 1903. This building has had a large and appreciative attendance. The average daily attendance has been about one hundred and fifty and the Literary Society has one hundred members. The religious services have been well attended and a large Bible class kept up during the entire year. Educational classes, too, have been doing good work. Eleven thousand letters were written, the stationery being furnished free by the Y. M. C. A. There is a great demand for reading matter here, and all reading matter sent to The Naval Y. M. C. A., at Olongopo, P. I., will be greatly appreciated by the men of the Navy and Marine Corps. There have been six conversions at Olongopo and there is a Y. M. C. A. membership of sixty.

Literal Obedience

AT a recent evangelistic meeting, a scoffer said that Christians did not obey Christ literally. "Where is the man," he asked, "who would turn the other cheek when he was struck?" After a few moments a young man rose. "I am not used to public speaking," he said, "but I would like to answer that question. I am a carpenter by trade, and at the time of my conversion there were nineteen, besides myself, in the shop where I worked. The next day they had got to know all about it. They were a rough, godless set, and they made up their minds to take my religion out of me! Oh, it was cruel bad how they went on! What one didn't know the others did, and so among nineteen unconverted shopmates and the great enemy of souls I had rather a hot time of it, I can assure you. They aimed at two things—one, to make me curse and swear as I used to do; the other, to exasperate me and make me angry. But my wife used to say to me, 'Be brave, Jim! Keep a good heart towards your mates! 'Tis a long lane that has got no ending, and it will all end right if you be patient and endure.'

"Well, they carried on their game for two weeks and failed, but one evening they held a little conference. Before they parted, it was resolved that one of them should walk up to me the next morning, and that he should deal me a blow with his fist on my face. I saw him walk up the shop the day after, when I was standing at the bench, and thought that perhaps he wanted a tool of some sort. When I turned round he struck me a tremendous blow on my right cheek. For a minute or two I scarcely knew where I was—for he sent me staggering. But when I did recover, and saw a laugh on his countenance, I felt all the old nature—the flesh, as Paul calls him, rising up within me. Both my fists were clenched, and if a stronger power had not interfered, I should have knocked him down there and then.

"Ah! I've been thankful ever since that I didn't do it. No, no, but I owe it all to the grace of God.

"So I wheeled up to my shopmate and I said to him: 'Look here, mate, you know very well that two months ago, before I was converted, I should have floored you in less time than this for such a piece of business as that. But, as you know, the Lord Jesus has made a new man of me, and I cannot, for very love of him, who has done so much for me, I cannot strike you back for the blow you have given me. Now, then, Fred, instead of my returning blow for blow, and striking you back, I'll turn round to you the other side of my face, and you can give me another smack like the first, if you have got a mind to.'

"Friends, you should have seen how sheepish he looked. I am sure he would have been glad to have crept into an eggshell. He was not at all willing to accept my offer, and he walked back to his place utterly ashamed of himself.

"Well, then, that young sceptic wants to see a man, who, having been smitten on one cheek, and, not very lightly either, turned round the other. Then I say to him: 'Look this way, young man, for here is the very individual you are looking after.'"

Cincinnati's Evangelistic Campaign

Since early last March, the Churches of the Disciples of Christ, in and about Cincinnati, O., have been planning for a great movement of Christian Evangelism in that city. Last year similar movements were made at Cleveland and Chicago with success. The Cincinnati campaign now on, will continue at least three weeks, in which some twenty or twenty-five churches will take part. Simultaneous services will be held. Beside the regular daily or nightly services, there are frequent general meetings of the leaders for conference, counsel and prayer. Sunday afternoons and frequently at the noon hour week days, mass meetings for evangelism are held in the Y. M. C. A. and other central places. These services reach thousands who never go into churches.—S. T. WILLIS.

Have you ever priced hand-knitted crocheted garments at a store? The difference between the cost of the yarn and the price of the finished garment is pretty wide, isn't it?

Knitted and crocheted garments are in high fashion just now. Why not knit or crochet some for yourself? Put your idle fingers to work, and you will be surprised at how little time it really takes to furnish your wardrobe with the most becoming garments a woman can wear. To produce satisfactory results, however, only the best yarns should be used.

The "Fleisher" Yarns combine all the qualities required by the expert knitter or crocheter—evenness, elasticity, loftiness. They are in a full line of beautiful colors, from the rich shades used for afghans, to the light delicate tints for children's garments.

If you use The "Fleisher" Yarns you are sure that the working will be a pleasure and that the garment will stand the test of time and wear.

soon discovered that the woman who takes paying guests must steel herself against many petty annoyances. People who are accustomed to a nomadic life grow critical unwittingly, and the boarder is often a chronic fault-finder. Thus, when the first morning Peggy sat at the head of her perfectly appointed table, spread with the whitest of linen and set with the daintiest of china, flowers in a vase on the pretty centre-piece and the old silver polished until it shone, she felt at ease in her mind. All seemed bright and beautiful. Miss Pease, at the other end of the table, was ready to carve the steak or dispense the chops. The fruit was arranged in a cut-glass dish, peaches, grapes and oranges, and Norah, in a white apron, was ready to pass it. Norah scorned a black dress, collar and cuffs, and a cap. No persuasion would have induced her to put on the latter badge of servitude. As she had to officiate as cook and waitress both, her clean print gown was suited to either capacity.

"Mr. Slocum never eats fruit," said Mrs. Slocum, in a voice expressive of grim determination. "Fruit does not agree with him."

Mr. Slocum cast a longing glance at the fruit, but dared not touch it. Evidently it was forbidden him by his doctor or his wife.

"Would Mr. Slocum prefer something cooked, a baked apple, hot, or stewed prunes? I will try to have what you all like," said Peggy, surveying the group around her board with an anxious eye.

"Mr. Slocum never eats fruit, raw or cooked," reiterated his wife, firmly.

Mr. Slocum buried himself in the morning paper. When the cereal appeared, Mrs. Slocum helped herself and her husband generously, and then poured so much cream on both saucers that Peggy, in great apprehension, feared that none would be left for the Misses Paynter. Her plan had been to pass to every one both milk and cream, supposing that the latter would be taken somewhat sparingly. She found herself this morning a little skimped when she poured the coffee.

"In Edgetown we cannot have all the cream we want," she timidly ventured, "so we have to economize a little."

"But when we pay for cream we don't want milk," answered Mrs. Slocum, whereat Peggy blushed deeply. Clearly this person was not a lady. The contact of a true gentlewoman for the first time with a woman who is innately coarse and vulgar, is always a shock and an acute distress. Peggy's eyes were dim for a moment, but Miss Lavina came to the rescue. She had entertained too many summer boarders not to have encountered Mrs. Slocum's type before this.

"We will do the best we can for you, Mrs. Slocum," she said; "but my cousin has not had experience and you must be patient. All the cream we can spare you shall hereafter have."

That morning Miss Lavina stalked to the shopping district and made various purchases. Among them were individual cream and milk pitchers, which thenceforward were placed, filled, at each plate. They contained a sufficient quantity for each guest and were not replenished.

Early the second morning, the bell from Mrs. Slocum's chamber was violently rung.

Norah could not leave her cooking of breakfast to answer bells, so Priscilla, who was dusting the parlor, ran up and tapped lightly at the door.

"Inform your mistress," said Mrs. Slocum, grandly, "that the water in our room is not hot this morning. Oh, you are one of the family, I see. Why is not the water hot, may I ask?"

"Let it run a little while, Mrs. Slocum, and it will be hot enough to burn your fingers," said Priscilla, murmuring to herself, "The old cat!" as she went back to her morning task.

At the end of a fortnight the Slocums left, to the relief of every one. Peggy laughed and cried when their trunks were carried downstairs. The Misses Paynter, who had been sweet and inoffensive, suddenly resolved to go to Florida for the benefit of the invalid. They paid two weeks' board in lieu of warning, and they, too, were presently a memory of the past.

"Now, Miss Peggy," declared Miss Norah, squaring her ample shoulders, "we've had enough of this foolishness. No more boarders here, please God!"

"No, Norah, we'll try lodgers next," said Peggy. TO BE CONTINUED

A Notable Wedding Anniversary

MR. AND MRS. WHITING B. SHELDON, of Newburgh, N. Y., celebrated the sixty-third anniversary of their marriage recently. Many congratulations were extended to the couple, who have traveled life's pathway together for so many years. Mr. Sheldon was born in the town of Livingston, Columbia County, N. Y., on March 2, 1823. His wife first saw the light in Hartford, Conn., in 1825. They were married in Red Hook, Dutchess County, N. Y., on October 13, 1842. Mr. Sheldon, in speaking of his long life, says the larger part of it has been spent in Hudson, N. Y., where he was employed by Charles Paul, a devoted Christian gentleman, a member of the Presbyterian Church. The two men became very much attached to one another, and for several years before Mr. Paul's death, Mr. Sheldon occupied the position of confidential clerk. "In 1855," continues Mr. Sheldon, "I gave my heart to the Lord Jesus, which was a joy to my dear employer, as well as to myself. My wife and I connected ourselves with the M. E. Church, the place of her conversion as well as my own, which we regularly attend every Sabbath when the weather permits."

Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon are both in excellent health, and may be spared to see many more anniversaries.

A Boy's Tribute

One of the visitors at the homes established by the late Dr. T. J. Barnardo, tells of a pathetic testimony of one of the boys. He was a poor little fellow who was lying ill in the sick ward, and she sat by his bed listening to his praise of the good doctor. She says: "At that very moment the ward door opened and in came the Doctor himself, for he had promised to be with his little friends for part of the evening. At sight of the good man, the little lad grew quite excited, and nearly leaped out of bed, 'That's 'im,' he almost shouted, as he administered a most emphatic push to the lady's arm. 'That's 'im, don't he look 'appy?' Then, in a sort of stage whisper, bending near the lady, and giving her yet another reminder of the importance of what he was saying: 'He seems as if he was always lookin' for a 'ed to pat.'" The tears come into the lady's eyes as she listened to this impromptu tribute.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

In Old Seville*

SEVILLE has been conspicuous in art and music, being the birthplace of Velazquez and Murillo, as well as the scene of Mozart's "Don Juan" and "Figaro," Rossini's "The Barber of Seville," and of Bizet's "Carmen." Its present tendency seems to be more in accord with the Bohemian character of the light operas mentioned, than in upholding the high standards set by its great masters in art. While Seville is certainly a novel little world, with as unique features and pictures as can be found in Europe, the "motif" of its general character and life is not exalted. In spite of its commercial activity, Seville can show an immense number of picturesque idlers and loungers, who are adepts at guitar playing, singing and gambling. The women of Seville, although famed for their grace and beauty, cannot as a class be said to have a large intellectual horizon, as dress, the opera and the bull-fight, usually constitute the great prizes of their existence.

The streets of the city present a strange medley of sights and sounds, their motley throngs giving an interesting portraiture of the Spanish traits of indolence, love of music, light-hearted disregard of the future, and fondness for hilarious amusement. In some of the cafes like the Suizo and the Novedades (both of which are on the Calle de las Sierpes, the principal thoroughfare), some characteristic gipsy dances may be seen. Across the river is Triana, which is the exclusive quarter of the Spanish gipsies, where gipsy costumes and dancing can be witnessed in all the abandon of their bizarre environment. It can scarcely be said, however, that these make a large contribution to art and morality.

Bull-fights seem to be distinctly a Spanish institution, and have been in vogue for over four centuries. It is a cruel and brutalizing sport, and doubtless has had much to do with deadening the mental and moral life of the nation. In Southern Spain these exhibitions are held on every Sunday and holiday from Easter to November. It is to be hoped that the announcement which appeared in the newspapers recently is true, namely, that the Institute of Social Reform in Spain has ratified the absolute prohibition of bull-fights on Sunday. The extent to which this national pastime is carried may be judged from the fact that there are not less than 252 specially constructed buildings in Spain for this purpose, while in 174 other localities, the market-places are temporarily adapted for the exhibition. It is said that a single bull-fighter, in the season of 1894, killed no less than 225 animals, and netted as his share of the proceeds about $75,000. The bull-ring in Seville is an imposing building, with room for 14,000 spectators.

Next to bull-fighting, the lottery is the universal passion. This is a public institution, managed on a tremendous scale, in which almost the entire populace, including women and children, try their fortune, and even visitors are constantly importuned to purchase tickets. As the Spaniards of the lower classes cannot read, the various prizes that are offered are not printed in the newspapers, but are loudly heralded through the streets. The tickets are sold in special shops, which are almost as numerous as the wine houses.

Until long after midnight the main streets of the city are noisy and alive with revelers. Meantime the watchman or sereno, armed with a spear and lantern, parades the street and in stentorian voice calls out the hour of the night, besides singing an "Ave Maria" on every corner.

The Mediterranean Traveler, from which the foregoing description is taken, is the work of Dr. D. E. Lorenz. He has, with rare art, combined all the essential qualities of a good guide-book with such vivid description of life and manners as to be read with great pleasure even by those who have no expectation of taking the trip. The first chapter deals with the Madeira islands; then the traveler is taken through the most picturesque portions of Spain; crosses from Gibraltar to Algiers, and on to the older civilizations—Greece, the Holy Land, to Jerusalem, Egypt and Italy. The historical portions show a great deal of painstaking research. The illustrations throughout are excellent. Price $2.50. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, Chicago, Publishers.

Mrs. H. M. C., Kentucky. "I was in great trouble. He helped me, and I know God will answer prayer. I want to tell the world how good he has been to me."

Miss R. C. J., Delaware. "It is a privilege to inclose this acknowledgment to Answered Prayer. That little column in your valued paper has often comforted me when days were dark and everything looked dreary."

Mary M., Pennsylvania. "I was in the hospital three weeks; was spared through a very serious operation; am home again with my dear family, and now I return my humble thanks to my dear Heavenly Father, who has done so much for me."

Mrs. W. J., New York. "We should never cease praying. There are times when our dear Lord tries us. For over ten years I offered two fervent petitions, and I never wavered. I firmly believed our Heavenly Father would hear my earnest prayer."

An Old Woman, Pennsylvania. "My prayers have been answered far beyond my expectations. The members of our church testify that their faith has been strengthened, and many brought into the fold in answer to our prayers."

Mrs. F. A. H., Louisiana. "I have had faith given me in reading 'Answered Prayers,' and if my testimony will add strength, even in the smallest degree, I cheerfully give it. I had a great sorrow in my family. I prayed and the Father heard me."

R. B. H., North Carolina. "God has answered my prayers for many, many things. I can't see why all do not trust him more and carry all things to him who is able to give. I am still trusting and praying. The Answered Prayer column has helped me very much."

G. W. N., Oklahoma. "Communion with God is sweet when we commit our ways unto him. Though knowing our needs, he wants us to tell him about them. Praise his holy name for answering my prayers, especially to the saving of some little boys."

Jessie S., Brussels, Ont., Can. "I promised my Saviour if he would answer my prayer in sending back to me a dear one, that I would acknowledge it. He has answered the prayer, for which we are truly thankful, and trust that it may bring us nearer to God."

N. C. B., New York. "Your 'Answered Prayer' column has been a great inspiration to me. It is very evident God hears and answers prayer. He has been a great source of strength to me in my life, and when the way seems the darkest I always look to him."

S. S., Ohio. "We have found that God not only answers our prayers when we are in trouble, but also the more trivial, common-place, everyday perplexities that beset us. 'He is full of compassion and of great goodness, and hath not dealt with us after our sins.'"

OLD FASHIONED FARE

Hot Biscuits, Griddle-Cakes, Pies and Puddings

The food that made the fathers strong is sometimes unfit for the children under the new conditions that our changing civilization is constantly bringing in. One of Mr. Bryan's neighbors in the great State of Nebraska writes:

"I was raised in the South, where hot biscuits, griddle-cakes, pies and puddings are seen at almost every meal, and by the time I located in Nebraska I found myself a sufferer from indigestion and its attendant ills—distress and pains after meals, an almost constant headache, dull, heavy sleepiness by day and sleeplessness at night, loss of flesh, impaired memory, etc., etc.

"I was rapidly becoming incapacitated for business, when a valued friend suggested a change in my diet, the abandonment of heavy, rich stuff and the use of Grape-Nuts food. I followed the good advice and shall always be thankful that I did so.

"Whatever may be the experience of others, the beneficial effects of the change were apparent in my case almost immediately. My stomach, which had rejected other food for so long, took to Grape-Nuts most kindly; in a day or two my headache was gone, I began to sleep healthfully and before a week was out the scales showed that my lost weight was coming back. My memory was restored with the renewed vigor that I felt in body and mind. For three years now Grape-Nuts food has kept me in prime condition, and I propose to use it all for the rest of my days.

"And by the way, my 2½ year old baby is as fond of Grape-Nuts as I am, always insists on having it. It keeps her as healthy and pretty as they make them." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

How to Have STORM-PROOF CHIMNEYS

Use "The Best" Revolving Chimney Top

Protects the Chimney and Creates Strong Draft.

The slightest breeze causes "The Best" to turn its back to the wind or rain, as it is perfectly adjusted on ball bearings.

The constant suction draws the smoke, and keeps up a steady draft, regardless of direction of wind or proximity of taller buildings.

Galvanized Iron Extensions afford poor chimney protection, and, as is the case with revolving Tops of that material, they must be replaced within one or two years.

"The Best" cast-iron Top and Steel Vane are practically indestructible. We paint them with asphaltum.

Anyone can attach Top to chimney, and fasten it firmly in place it will defy any storm.

Made in 3 sizes. Prices $5.00, $6.00 and $7.00, freight prepaid. Money refunded if not satisfactory after 30 days' trial. We've written a book about "The Best"—let us send you a copy free.

The President's Southern Tour

righteousness, and the superlative importance of good family life as the unit of the life of the nation.

Earlier in the day the President visited Tuskegee, when, after a brief stay in the town, having been welcomed by the Mayor and other leading citizens, he spoke from a platform on the grounds of the Girls' College. The President's train was then taken directly into the grounds of the Institute over its private track. Great crowds of country people, both black and white, had gathered in Tuskegee from the surrounding territory, and watched the reception of the President by Principal Booker T. Washington and members of the Institute Board of Trustees and Faculty. Mr. Roosevelt then entered a beautiful carriage made by students of the school, drawn by horses raised at the school, and driven by a student in the uniform of the school, and was conveyed to the reviewing stand. This carriage was followed by four others, also made by Tuskegee students, in which were seated the Presidential party. A fine parade, industrial and educational, which had been in preparation for weeks, passed before the reviewing stand. The President was deeply impressed by what he saw, and in his speech following the review, he was most appreciative and encouraging toward the Tuskegee people and their efforts.

A tremendous ovation greeted the President at Little Rock, Ark. Governor Jefferson Davis delivered an address of welcome, in which there were references to lynch law. When the President rose to speak to the enormous gathering of some 60,000 persons, the vast crowd was remarkably quiet. Mr. Roosevelt greeted the people in a few words and then turned toward the Governor, and said in part: "To avenge one heinous crime by another heinous crime is to reduce the man doing it to the level of the man who committed the bestial crime. . . . Above all men, Governor, you and I, and all who are exponents and representatives of the law, owe it to our people, owe it to the cause of civilization and humanity, to do everything in our power, officially and unofficially, directly and indirectly, to free the United States from the reproach and menace of lynch law."

From Little Rock the President proceeded to New Orleans by way of Memphis. Nearly 400,000 people assembled in New Orleans to greet him, and so great was the crush and danger of accident that he cut short his speech, dismissing the multitude, as it became almost unmanageable. The day was the greatest and most enthusiastic the city of New Orleans has ever seen. Much of this outburst of intense feeling was due to the belief that the President, by his prompt action in giving assistance to the U. S. Marine Hospital Service, had helped to save the city from the awful yellow fever epidemic. At the close of the day Mr. Roosevelt, in spite of his stalwart constitution, was worn out, and it seemed doubtful if he could stand another such day.

Shortly after midnight, on October 26, the lighthouse tender Magnolia, with President Roosevelt on board, came in collision with the fruit steamer Esparta. The accident occurred near Nairn, which is sixty miles below New Orleans. Both vessels were reported aground at the river bank. Captain Rose, of the Esparta, said that no one was seriously injured by the collision. The commander of the Magnolia took no chances whatever when his vessel was struck, but headed straight for the river bank and plunged the tender's nose in the mud. The revenue cutter Ivy, which had come up from Port Eads to Nairn, took the President off the disabled Magnolia and proceeded down the river. At 9.40 A.M. the President boarded the West Virginia. After firing a salute of twenty-one guns she weighed anchor and steamed out to sea.

A woman is as old as she looks
How old do you look?

The secret is in the pores. Pompeian Massage Cream clears and cleans them when choked by dust and by talcum powder put on to remove grease and shine. On this all its other work depends.

An open skin means a healthy cleanliness and a free circulation of the blood to the surface. So-called "black-heads" and other disfigurements go with one massage, while the healthy, ruddy glow remains.

It Makes a Woman Beautiful

Every gentlewoman knows that her attractiveness depends on a clear complexion and good coloring. The most beautiful features in the world are unpleasant with a yellow, oily, muddy skin. Pompeian Cream brings the blood to the pores and removes shine. It contains no grease, so it makes no shine of its own.

Pompeian Massage Cream

Removes Wrinkles Forever

Wrinkles are caused by loose skin. Pompeian Massage Cream is a true skin food, and used with gentle massage fills the little valleys, builds out sunken cheeks and insures smooth, ruddy, firm skin. It also develops the bust, whether small by nature, wasted by illness, or reduced by nursing.

Pompeian Cream makes "cosmetics" unnecessary. Nothing else is needed for perfect results. Even face powder (which clogs the pores) should be avoided, as Pompeian Cream removes all face shine. Pompeian Massage Cream is massaged in and then rubbed out—the dirt comes with it. It works by going—not by staying.

POMPEIAN TRADE MARK MASSAGE CREAM

We prefer you to buy of your dealer whenever possible. Do not accept a substitute for Pompeian under any circumstances. If your dealer does not keep it, send us his name, and we will send a 50c. or $1.00 jar of the cream postpaid on receipt of price.

All This We Prove With Our Sample—Sent Free with one copy of our beautifully illustrated book on Facial Massage—a practical course which enables any gentlewoman to become expert in this most necessary of modern aids to cleanliness—if you will send us the name of your dealer and state whether he does or does not sell Pompeian Cream.

Gentlemen who appreciate a clear, ruddy skin, also find it a great luxury, particularly after shaving. It removes the soap rubbed into the pores and takes away the smart after a close shave. Tell your husband, brother or sweetheart about it. It is applied by the best barbers (look for the name and trade mark on the jar) or may be used at home.

TAKES TIME

Some Years Getting There and What Happened Then.

The poison in coffee does not always work its mischief swiftly—sometimes it fastens its hold upon the victim by slow degrees that are not noticeable for a while. But once it begins, the day will surely come when the coffee drinker will be "up against it" and must have relief.

A lady writes from Cal.:

"We were great coffee drinkers in our home, using it at every meal and frequently drinking it in the evening with friends, and it was not until after the lapse of years that we began to realize that it was doing us harm.

"My symptoms were not so bad, although my health suffered in many minor ways, but my husband became afflicted with a most painful stomach trouble. He could not assimilate his food properly and everything he ate gave him great distress. We were slow to suspect the truth, but we now see that it was caused by the use of coffee.

"At last he determined to quit using coffee altogether, and like a good wife I did so, too. We worried along for a month without any hot table beverage, till one day a friend happened to say to me, 'I am using Postum Food Coffee now, and feel so much better for it.' I told her that we had tried it and did not care for it, and she said it must have been because it wasn't properly prepared. So I bought a package and prepared it strictly according to directions. We were astonished and delighted at the result.

"We have been using Postum Coffee for a year, now, and I rejoice to be able to tell you that it has relieved my husband of his dyspepsia. This is a statement that does not seem to have the significance it ought to have. If I could make you understand how intense his sufferings used to be, you would realize what a deliverance Postum wrought for him.

"My own health has also greatly improved and the credit for all must be given to Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

MEN AND WOMEN OF THE HOUR

Alderman Walter Vaughan Morgan is the new Lord Mayor of London. Mr. Morgan is a Welshman, and was educated at the famous "Blue-Coat School" in London. He is a prominent banker, and governor of Christ's hospital. His jurisdiction is only over a square mile of the city, but his salary is equal to President Roosevelt's.

The Countess of Tankerville and her husband have been making a tour of England, holding evangelistic services. All of the meetings have been attended by large audiences. The Countess is an American, formerly Miss Van Marter, of New York City.

Pierre de Brazza, called "the second Stanley," died recently, and his funeral was celebrated with great pomp in Paris. He began his operations in Africa in 1875, and later founded several towns in the Dark Continent. He kept up his explorations until 1897.

Miss Elizabeth J. Moss is a second Portia. Only twenty-three, she has been sworn in as a member of the Bar of the State of New York, and will at once take up the active practice of law. Miss Moss has a far different aim from that of most women who have entered the legal ranks. "I have not studied for diversion," she said. "Many poor people come to my father for advice I hope to be able to take this work off his hands- I believe I can help many poor people who cannot help themselves."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Mutual Obligations*

EVERY Christian has a service to render to his brother, and a duty to fulfil to the world on his brother's account. The solidarity of the Church, the fact that if one member falls the others are disgraced, and the interest of the whole body in each member, constitute an obligation that it is treason to ignore. The motto of a trades-union, that "the injury of one is the concern of all," is changed in the kingdom of Christ to a personal responsibility. The welfare and the consistent conduct of one, is there the concern of all. It is reasonable that it should be so, because the good name of the Church, in which every member of it is concerned, is in the keeping of individuals. When the world, with perverted logic, points to an inconsistent Christian as a type of Christ's followers, it curtails the power of the Church and undermines its influence. The Christian who is tempted to sin has not only his own soul to consider, but the fact that his sin will dishonor every one who bears the name of Christ and will bring reproach on Christ himself. It is sad that it should be so, and the world manifests its sophistry in thus reasoning; but there is no use in ignoring the fact, and it should be met with a consistent life. It takes knowledge of the Christian, that he has been with Jesus, and it regards him as representing the character and teaching of his Lord. How weighty, therefore, is the responsibility the Christian takes upon himself when he assumes the name of Christ.

Besides this attitude to the world the Christian has an obligation to his brethren. The fact that his fellow Christian is his brother ought never to be forgotten. Christ laid special emphasis on this conception. The cup of water given to a man, because he belonged to Christ, had an especial value because of its motive. If this idea had the weight Christ intended it to have there would not be a Christian in need on earth. His lack would be the concern of his brethren and they would be eager to supply it, feeling that, in serving their brother, they were doing a service to their Lord. He is beyond our power to help now. How gladly would we entertain him, how joyfully we would minister to him, what an honor to carry his cross! Well, we can do it. He lives again in his people. In serving and helping them we render a service to him which he never forgets.

Medical Missions†

THAT is a significant story that Dr. Jacob Chamberlain tells of his medical work in India. The daughter of a Brahman had been very ill and an operation was necessary. The distracted father waited till it was over, and was then admitted to the room. To his delight, he found his daughter resting easily, immensely relieved by what had been done for her. He prostrated himself before the missionary and kissed his feet. Dr. Chamberlain told him that he should not do that. God alone should receive worship. But the Brahman said: "God has sent his healing mercy to my daughter through you, let my worship go back through you to him." That incident is the key to the value of medical mission work. The recognition of the missionary as the instrument, the channel, of divine mercy, is the first step to the recognition of him as the messenger of truth. That was Christ's own method. He would not pose as a wonder-worker, but ever sought to have his miracles regarded as evidences of his authority as a teacher.

Apart from the missionary's primary mission as a preacher of Christianity, his work has a special value from a humane standpoint. Dr. George D. Dowkontt, of New York, who has been instrumental in training medical missionaries who have gone to all parts of the world, tells distressing stories of the horrors endured by the afflicted in heathen lands. They are mistreated, neglected and subjected to torture under the false idea that they are bewitched. In many cases a disease that would yield to simple remedies is turned into a fatal illness by the ridiculous remedies that the heathen medicine-man applies. The medical missionary goes as a messenger of mercy and his service paves the way for the reception of the Gospel. Especially is this so with the noble women who have taken up the profession. Where the male doctor is excluded by Oriental prejudice the women of heathendom have to suffer untold pangs without relief. To them the coming of a qualified Christian physician, in female form, is a boon from heaven. After she has relieved their pain they can understand the mission of the Master they serve and trust Him to recover them from sin, as his follower has recovered them from their sickness.

Unselfish Solicitude

By Mrs. M. Baxter

ALL that we are told of the origin of Nehemiah is that he was the son of Hachaliah (Neh. 1: 1; 10: 1); the rest he tells himself. He was one of the Jewish captives, perhaps born in captivity, but had risen to prominence in the court of Artaxerxes, the king of Persia. This was at Shushan, the Median capital, situated between Babylon on the left, the Persian Gulf on the south, and the Caspian Sea on the north. It would be a much longer journey to Jerusalem from Shushan than from Babylon.

Nehemiah relates that in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, which must have been thirteen years after Ezra's journey to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 7: 7, 9), in the month Chisleu, answering to our December, he was in Shushan the palace, and news reached him from Jerusalem. "Hanani," he says, "one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah." There was one thing upon the heart of Nehemiah; it was his people—God's people. No self-interest took a primary place with him. Neither the duties of his office at court, nor any family consideration, could take the primary place with him. God and God's people were ever first. Is this so with us? Does "the first and great commandment" (Matt. 22: 36) hold such sway over us that the things of God, and that which touches him and his people, touch us to the quick as no personal consideration of ease, comfort, position, reputation, or any earthly thing can do? Is it so? Alas! there are few who are thus dead to themselves and thus alive unto God. Is it the things which touch God and his people, which keep us awake at night, which move us to tears, which claim the most of our time, our thought, our money?

Nehemiah asked these men who were come from Jerusalem "concerning the Jews that had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem." It was a pitiful story they had to tell. The remnant of the captivity are in great affliction and reproach: the wall also of Jerusalem is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire (Neh. 1: 3). But how came this about? Ezra had been used of God to lead the people to repentance. In the Epistle to the Hebrews how constantly the writer exhorts to steadfastness of purpose In Heb. 2: 1 he warns the Hebrews to give earnest heed to the things heard, lest at any time they (we) should "let them slip" (or, R. V., "drift away"), for Paul fears for himself as well as for them. Again (Heb. 3: 6) he speaks of Christ as a son over his own house, whose are we, if we hold fast, the glorying of our hope even to the end (R. V., ver. 14). "We are become partakers of Christ if we hold fast the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end." Again (4: 14), "Let us hold fast our profession." This is only possible as we live a life of prayer.

Undoubtedly the returned Jews had failed in this very thing, and thus the blessing of the Lord had ceased to be with them. They were in affliction, and this could not have been if they had been in the will of God; for he doth not afflict willingly, and he had promised his people of old that if they hearkened and obeyed he would prosper them, and in all three passages the reverse is threatened if they failed to hearken and to obey.

God laid the burden of his people on Nehemiah. When he heard these things, he sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven. Nehemiah did not just sigh, and say, "How sad!" and talk it over with some of his acquaintances, and then drop the subject, as we have so often done, when we have contemplated the condition of God's people in these days. He believed something could be done by him who alone could do it.

Student, Syracuse, N. Y. Is there any other record of Solomon's death than that in the Bible? I have heard that there is.

There is a tradition quoted by Farrar as current among the Jews, that Solomon died in the temple that he built. It is said that he went up to the temple to pray and stood there with his crown on his head and his white hair flowing over his mantle. The onlookers saw him shudder and grow pale and believed him dead, but he stood there leaning on his staff. None dare approach him because he had on his finger the ring which gave him power over men and demons. But a mouse ran out and nibbled at the leather on the end of his staff, until it slipped on the pavement, and the corpse of the great king fell and his crown rolled on the floor. This, of course, is mere tradition.

M. A. S., Providence, R. I. Is it true that the Germans lay claim to Lincoln as being of German descent?

At a recent meeting in New York, Prof. Eugen Kuchnemann, of Posen, made certain somewhat novel claims in connection with German interests in America. He contended that the Icelanders who came here centuries ago were Germans; that Germans accompanied the Spanish explorers, and that Abraham Linkhorn, of Virginia, the grandfather of "Old Abe," was a German.

A. L. W., Bristol, Tenn. A minister said to me that the hymns or songs, such as "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," "Praise God From Whom all Blessings Flow," etc., are not divine worship. He said God did not command such singing. The Psalms are the only songs that have been written by an inspired writer.

All praise that comes from the heart and finds utterance at the lips, is acceptable to the Lord, even though it be only the lisping of a child. All through its existence, the Christian Church has had its Psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, each age producing a variety of its own. Many of these hymns have been the means of bringing multitudes into the kingdom. The Psalms will doubtless never be neglected by the Christian Church, as they are the basis of all spiritual song; but each age and generation has its own needs, its own experiences, and its own special causes for praise and thanksgiving. The Psalms, to a great extent, represented the religious thought of the Hebrew race. The Christian hymnology of to-day, based on Christ's life and sacrifice, and that Gospel which "brought life and immortality to light," takes a wider range. The whole Christian world recognizes this, and praises God for his wonderful gift, which David and the sons of Asaph never knew.

Mrs. C. W. C., Clarinda, Ia. I am in need of your answer to these three questions for next Sunday's School work. Can you let it reach me in time? 1. Did Hezekiah pray for an addition of years at the time of his illness when God extended fifteen years; or was he lamenting that death had come and he could do good no longer? 2. At the time of the hand writing on the wall, only the finger (or part of the hand) was used. Did anyone besides the king see the hand? 3. Where was Daniel at the time of the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 3: 10-45)?

[This being an exceptional case, in order to make the answer available in time, we have telegraphed the substance of it to the correspondent. Any reader desiring a telegraphic reply should so state and prepay the message. EDITOR, THE MAIL-BAG.] 1. The prayer Hezekiah offered was an appeal to God from the sentence, "Thou shalt die and not live." Its object was plain, whether stated or not. It was probably urged, though in the brief summary of the prayer given in II. Kings 20 and in Isaiah 38: 3 it is not definitely recorded that he prayed for an extension of life. Josephus, however, says that "He entreated of the Lord that he would prolong his life for a little while, till he had some children." 2. There is no source of information beyond the record in the Bible. It is safe to conclude that what the king saw, his guests must have seen, as they were sitting at the table with him. Is the question important? The hand was there and the king saw it. 3. The date of Daniel's death is uncertain. In Daniel 1: 21 it is stated that he continued to the first year of King Cyrus, but that may mean that he continued in power until then. He was alive in the third year of Cyrus, for he had a vision in that year (see Daniel 10: 1). He was at that time living on the banks of the Hiddekel (the Tigris), probably in or near Babylon. That would be the year 533 B. C., when Daniel was eighty-five years old. There is a Mohammedan tradition that Daniel returned to Jerusalem and became governor of Syria, but it is not worthy of belief. He would be too old to undertake the journey of five hundred miles in those times.

Peter K., Newburg, N. Y. Will you please tell me how many men, privates and officers, constitute the regular army of the United States? How many officers and men are in Porto Rico, how many in the Philippines?

The actual strength of the military establishment on June 30 was 3,800 officers and 57,433 men in the regular army; 26 officers and 550 men in the Porto Rican provisional regiment, and 108 officers and 5,093 enlisted men in the Philippine Scouts, making a total of 3,934 officers and 63,022 men. The figures given for the enlisted force include the strength of the hospital corps, 3,060 men, which is not counted as a part of the enlisted force by law. According to an executive order, the maximum strength of the regular army, not including the hospital corps, is now fixed at 60,475.

Seventeen, Idaho. Can you give me in the MAIL-BAG a clear idea of what the "sweat shop" is? I see it so often mentioned in connection with poor working people of the cities.

The "sweating" system is used by subcontractors who undertake to do work in their own houses or small workshops, and employ others to do it, making a profit for themselves by the difference between the contract prices and the wages they pay their assistants. The "sweat shop," ill-ventilated and over-crowded still exists, in spite of laws and regulations enacted for its suppression.

M. E. A. S., Chippewa Falls, Wis. Who was Leander? Who did he swim the Hellespont to see? Where is the Hellespont?

Leander was a youth of Abydos, in Greece, who swam nightly across the Hellespont to visit his lady-love Hero, a priestess of Sestos. One night he was drowned in the attempt, and Hero leaped into the Hellespont also. The Hellespont, now called the Dardanelles, is a narrow channel within the Turkish dominions, which connects the sea of Marmora with the Grecian archipelago, and at this particular point separates Europe from Asia.

T. R. B., Augusta, Me. What is the exact meaning of the word "shibboleth," and in what manner should it be used in modern language?

The word "shibboleth" was used as a test word by the Gileadites under Jephthah after their victory over the Ephraimites. The latter could not pronounce the word correctly, and betrayed themselves by saying "sibboleth." The word as now used, means a test of opinions and manners.

Reader, Staunton, Ill. Is it not right for church members and Christians to encourage and help the Salvation Army in their work, when they come into a town to work?

Assuredly it is right to help them. The Salvation Army is one of the greatest factors of the age in reaching the non-church going masses, and has done immense good

T. B., Columbus, O. 1. What is the present government income from our internal revenue system? 2. Would it not be a real economy besides being a distinct moral advantage were our government to take positive action for the suppression or rigid regulation of the liquor traffic?

The question may be answered by quoting from the appeal made by the National Prohibition Alliance to the President, which says: "The invested capital of the liquor traffic exceeds $500,000,000, and its retail cash income from the people of the United States is nearly $1,000,000,000 yearly. The internal revenue receipts from spirituous alcoholic liquors is less than $200,000,000, and the license and tax receipts of all State and local governments is less than $200,000,000 annually, while its cost, directly and indirectly, to the whole people exceeds $2,000,000,000 yearly in money and value alone." This simple statement of facts would seem to sufficiently answer both your questions. It is notorious that a very large proportion of the burden of taxation in populous communities is directly due to the liquor traffic which is responsible for sixty per cent. of the crime and pauperism in such communities. Even the conservative United States Supreme Court (on December 1887), declared that, "the disorder, pauperism and crime prevalent in the country are in some measure directly traceable to this evil. Any government action that would tend to ameliorate these conditions through firmly checking the liquor traffic would be welcomed by all right-thinking people.

Mountain Reader, Gutelius, B. C. Do you happen to know if Mr. George Muller ever bought food or anything else on credit? If his enormous family of orphans were without food, would he order it, trusting God to supply the means, or do they go hungry?

His principle was never to buy anything he had not the money on hand to pay for. He may have bought on credit, if he had the money, but never for more goods than his money would pay. Yet and this was his constant testimony, the children never went hungry. Sometimes after breakfast, there was neither food for dinner nor the money to buy it, yet in every instance the money or food came in, in the interval in answer to believing prayer.

Emma S., Duluth, Minn. 1. In what year did Dr. Klopsch go to Russia to help relieve the famine sufferers in that country? 2. What was the cause of the famine?

1. In 1892. He, together with the late Dr. Talmage, went to supervise the distribution of the cargo of American flour contributed by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and which was conveyed to Riga on the steamship Leo, which Dr. Klopsch personally chartered for the occasion. He visited many cities and also went to the interior with the grain, and saw much of it distributed personally. 2. The famine was caused by drought in sixteen provinces affecting over 20,000,000 souls.

C. A. W., Laramie, Wyo. In reading of the immense numbers of foreigners who have settled in New York City during the past few years a friend contended that the population of New York City was greater than that of the remainder of the State. Is this correct?

Your friend is mistaken. The State population of New York is now 8,066,673. Greater New York contains 4,014,304. The State outside of New York City has a population of 4,052,368, or 38,064 more than the population of New York City. In 1900 the city was ahead of the remainder of the State by 7,510.

W. G. R., Troy, N. Y. The poem, "Sympathy" is doubtless designed by the writer to inspire those who read it, to encourage those who are finding life a rather hard battle, and who have few to help or cheer them on.

President Roosevelt Greeted by the Blue and the Gray in Arkansas

When President Roosevelt visited Fort Logan, Arkansas, during his recent Southern tour, he was escorted by twenty-eight veterans of the Civil War, all on horseback. Half of the number were soldiers of the Union Army and the others had served in the Confederate Army. They rode in twos, each file being composed of a veteran from either army. In one of his speeches the President said, "I know no one will grudge my saying a special word of acknowledgment to the veterans of the Civil War. A man would indeed be a poor American who could without a thrill witness the way in which, in city after city, in the North and in the South, on every public occasion, the men who wore the blue and the men who wore the gray, now march and stand shoulder to shoulder, giving tangible proof that we are all now in fact as well as in name a re-united people."

Native Girls of India Picking Cotton on the Mission Farm

A Woman's Farm in India

HOW is it possible, the reader may ask, that any woman, and especially a white woman, should think of becoming a farmer in India, that land of famine and drought? Yet this is what more than one devoted missionary has done. Agriculture, the art primeval, is still in its infancy in the East, and nowhere more so than in India. The census gives 191,691,731 of the population as farmers, of whom 131,000,000 own their farms, while 18,750,000 are landlords drawing rents, and the remainder are farm laborers. This, over 80 per cent. of the population are agriculturists. It naturally follows that in a season of drought and subsequent dearth the suffering is very widespread.

One of the American missionaries—Miss Alice Yoder, of Berar—has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several very interesting photographs illustrative of the work on her "buffalo farm," for Miss Yoder has courageously set out to make a name for herself among missionary agriculturists. One of the missionaries at the Kumgaon station—Miss Emma Krate—gives this description of the workers there:

The cotton fields are now yielding their fruit, and the girls are busy picking. As the cart-loads of snow-white cotton are ready to be sent to the market, Mirabai (an orphan girl) is the last one by the cart, giving directions, tying the ropes and suggesting the price it ought to bring. She is interested in her work and joys in the fruit of her labors. Mirabai is a Christian. Not long ago, on her way to the fields, she met an uncle whom she thought had died during the famine. This uncle wanted her to leave the orphanage and go with him. He promised to deck her out with bangles and get her a husband. She gave him a decided answer in the negative, and then told how Jesus had saved her from sin. She pleaded with him to forsake idol worship and turn to the true God. She assured him she could never return to Hinduism.

The Mission Farmer Starting for the Fields

Kumberlabai and Mirabai

"Kumberlabai and Mirabai are two of our orphanage children whom THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have supported. They are grateful for all the gifts that have meant so much to them. Kumberlabai, the younger, is about twelve years old. She came to the orphanage about the time you took her support. She has accepted Jesus as her Saviour. Being of a quiet, studious nature, it is not hard for her to keep up with the other girls. She knows how to do plain sewing. She is a general favorite. Mirabai is about sixteen, and just the opposite of Kumberlabai. She is always foremost in every kind of fun and frolic. She is wholehearted, generous, good natured, happy, and a comfort to us all. Her ringing laugh is often heard across the compound. Before coming to the orphanage, she nearly died of starvation. She broke stones on the public roads for grain to keep her alive. When she was quite young her parents died, and her only brother, with whom she lived, forsook her during the stress of famine. After the bitter experiences of those days, the orphanage seems like a haven of rest to her. During the time she has been with us, she has done her best with books, and tried hard to keep up with her class. She is able to read and write a little, which means something for a native girl. Our orphanage stock consists of buffaloes, cows and bullocks—about fifty in all. If the cattle are sick, she helps doctor them; and at one time, when an epidemic of mouth-and-hoof disease was raging, she and the girl whom she helps, by their care and skill saved the lives of the animals. All around us cattle were dying, but our girls did not lose one head. In the field work she is indispensable, and looks after the crops with a zeal and interest that would rejoice a farmer's heart. She joys as much in sowing, weeding, and even in picking stones, as in the crops.

"At one time we were in great stress for want of rain, and some of the fields suffered. Mirabai at once planned to carry water to the fields. She hitched up the bullocks, and taking two large water-barrels, carried them to the fields, herself driving the bullocks. She kept this up day after day, until the rain came. The grass, which was stacked for the cattle, ran low, and it was necessary to bring fresh, green grass from the orphanage grass land, a distance of five miles. Mirabai was among the first to go for grass, and would be up at daybreak, starting for the grass lands with cart and bullocks. When the grass from these fields is being stacked, Mirabai is always at the stack helping to oversee the work."

SEEING and BELIEVING

TEXT: John 20: 29:

"Jesus saith unto him, Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

DOUBT has its uses, but it has been overworked and overpraised. Tennyson says that there lives more faith in honest doubt than in half the creeds, but if this is true, it is because in half the creeds the believing is dishonest. Honest doubting is, of course, far better than dishonest believing; but honest believing is better than honest doubting, and dishonest doubting is worse than dishonest believing. That is to say, the normal attitude of the mind is affirmation rather than negation. It is not by denying, but by affirming that the best mental progress is made. Pulling up tares and burning them is a useful part of husbandry, but less useful than sowing wheat and reaping it. What you do not believe can add nothing to your mental or moral resources; what you do believe may bring you some gains of knowledge and virtue.

Thomas was apparently one of those who put more emphasis upon disbelief than upon belief; who think it more important to refute an error than to accept a truth. The reply of Jesus is meant to suggest to him the defect of this method. It is, of course, a simple matter of disproportion. To doubt is often a duty, for much is offered to our credence that cannot be accepted. To prove all things, and hold fast only that which is good, involves the rejection of many forms of untruth and superstition. This duty Thomas was not slow to perform, but like many another he exalted a subordinate into a supreme obligation. He had not learned the truth that doubt is a good servant, but a bad master; that its first business is to learn its place and keep it.

Faith the Normal Attitude

It is not by its doubts, no matter how honest, but by its faiths that the soul is nourished. The rejection of unwholesome food is an act of wisdom, but you live not by refusing unwholesome food, but by selecting and eating wholesome food. To know and shun the wrong road is well, but it doesn't take you very far. If you wish to get anywhere you must find and follow the right road. It was this truth, that faith and not doubt is the central and normal attitude of the human soul, that Thomas needed to have brought home to him.

But his specific trouble was that he was disposed to base all his judgments on the witness of his senses. He must see and know by seeing. He must have what is sometimes called scientific evidence to go upon, else he would not go at all. It is this error which Jesus gently seeks to correct. Thomas has had ocular and tactual evidence of the fact whose existence he doubted, and he is now satisfied. But Jesus tells him that others may reach satisfaction by another route. "You believe," he says to Thomas, "because you have had the witness of your senses; and you are happy; but others will believe on another kind of evidence, and they will be happy too."

Does Jesus say that those who thus believe, not having seen, are happier than those who believe because they see? No, he does not say so here; he simply says that they are happy. He wants Thomas to know that he has no advantage over those who reach conviction by the other route. But though he does not say it here, he has, in effect, said it elsewhere. For he has told his disciples, and Thomas has heard him say it, that it is expedient for them that he go away, so that the unseen Friend may come in his place; that unseen Friend who is simply the spiritual Christ; whom their eyes cannot see, nor their hands touch, but with whom, in the silence of their own thoughts, they may have constant companionship. "He shall guide you into all the truth," he says, "for he shall take of mine and shall show it unto you."

Spiritual Evidence

"It is better for you"—this is his meaning—"that you should learn to deal with spiritual things by spiritual methods, and that you should not depend for certitude about spiritual things on the witness of your senses. You can see my body with your eyes; you can touch it with your hands, but it is not to sight nor to touch that the deep things of God are revealed. You know them, if you know them at all, not on the testimony of the senses, but on the testimony of the Spirit.

*Preached in the First Congregational Church, Columbus, O.

When Jesus thus contrasts believing with seeing, and puts the crown upon what we call faith, instead of on what we call knowledge, his words will, I have no doubt, seem to some of those who are listening to be rather absurd and visionary. Surely, they will say, the absolute and exact knowledge that one gets through his senses must be more trustworthy than mere credulity. Isn't it better to know than merely to believe? Is not the way of life more secure to the man who sees and knows than to the man who only believes?

That is a plausible kind of argument, but does it not after all rest on superficial reasoning? That is a question which I should like to study with you for a little while this morning. Let us take these conflicting principles out into the field of daily experience and test them there. I do not, for my own part, believe that the principles which guide us in our daily life can be radically unlike those which should guide us in our religious life. If there is no room for this principle of faith in our daily conduct, then it would be difficult for me to believe that it could be a safe guide in the great affairs of the soul. But if it is a principle that we find sound and wise in every-day life, then it can hardly be irrational to rely upon it in our higher concerns.

Faith Necessary in Business

When we approach the question from this point of view, we are at once compelled to acknowledge that faith is the mainspring of all our business enterprises.

To begin with, the foundation of everything is that confidence which men are compelled to repose in one another, which is the most important element in all our business operations. Paul says that without faith it is impossible to please God; but any man of the street will tell you that without faith it is impossible to do business. This kind of faith is getting some pretty severe wrenches just now; but we must not suffer ourselves to believe that the operations in these realms of high finance are typical. For, though there are many sharpers and swindlers in the business world, it is still true that the great body of our business men are veracious and trustworthy; we can rely on their promises; they do rely on one another, and, in the great majority of cases, this trust is honored. And, as I have already said, it is a simple commonplace to say that business could not be carried on at all without this faith in one another, on which foundation the whole superstructure of commerce securely rests.

It is not, however, merely faith of man in man that furnishes this foundation; it is something deeper; it is what we may call confidence in the market; confidence that the wheels of the great commercial mechanism will keep moving; faith in the existence of healthy and prosperous conditions. Sometimes that kind of faith fails, and the wheels are all blocked and there is stagnation and depression. There is money enough, but they who possess it keep it locked up in their own safes or in the vaults of banks; credit, which is nothing but faith, is lame and infirm, and therefore business creeps along timidly and toilfully.

But there is a more personal sense in which faith is central in our secular affairs. No man succeeds without believing in success—in his own success; and belief is all that he has to build upon. Knowledge of the issues of his undertakings he cannot possess.

Faith Necessary to Success

You cannot know, you cannot demonstrate, that a given venture in trade will be successful. No man can see to the end of any business undertaking. The enterprise looks likely to be successful and therefore you embark in it. But a thousand circumstances which you cannot foresee may arise and change what you counted a moral certainty into a physical impossibility.

You do not know that your field will remunerate your labor if you plant in it a certain crop. You think so; there are good reasons for believing that it will, and therefore you plant that crop. You do not know when you choose a certain calling and embark in it that you will succeed in it. But you believe that you are better fitted for that than for anything else, and you have a strong confidence that you can reach prosperity and independence in this way, and therefore you enter upon it.

That we do walk by faith, and not by sight, in our secular affairs; that it is quite impossible for have demonstrative evidence in any of them is plain; and we shall be able to see, if we reflect a ment, that it is vastly better so. For suppose tha knew precisely what result would follow each venture; suppose that it were possible for us to definite, mathematical certainty with regard to the come of all our enterprises, what would life bec Only a cunningly devised piece of machinery. we learned how to turn the crank our develop would be at an end. We should have nothing mo inspire and incite us.

Development by Faith

Just think, my mercantile friend! Suppose you proposed to lay in a stock of goods you just what the invoice would be; just how soon should be able to dispose of it; just how much you should make upon it, and just how all your tomers would be affected toward you by your s how much genius would it require to be a merch Those business qualities upon which you pride you most, and which make you the man that you are— judgment, your enterprise, your influence, your en would be utterly annihilated in such a state of th It would be impossible to acquire such qualities such circumstances, and if by any means you s acquire them you could not use them. There wou no room or demand for them. It is only by the u tainties of trade that they are developed. Because are compelled to deal with probabilities instead of tainties you keep vigilant and active, and thus powers of mind are disciplined. All the flavor piquancy of life would be gone if there were not uncertain, if there were no balancing of probabi and prophesying of issues. It would be too flat stale for human endurance.

Life would all be tame were it not for the contin cies with which it is environed. We should be stupid, passionless drones; there might be some lea in the world, but genius would not even have a to live, for the quality to which we give that title scope only when there are hidden things to bring f and unexpected difficulties to overcome, and an u future to prophecy. We may fancy that it woul fine to possess the gift of infallible foresight, but i did possess it, it would put an end to moral grow not to mental culture. Our natures are so formed they require to be exercised in a sphere of uncerta Walking by sight, we should become a race of pig Walking by faith, we attain the statue of manhood

Believing rather than seeing is the method the all our secular affairs, a method that we all can u stand to be wisely and divinely appointed.

The Basis of Morals

Faith is not only the mainspring of business, it i essence of morality. In every moral act there is preference of some unseen spiritual good, to some that is seen. This preference of course involves in the existence of the unseen good preferred. stands the little boy in the presence of the forbi fruit. It looks luscious and tempting, but he r the temptation because he believes that it is wron him to steal, because he respects that law of right is written in his conscience. If he refrains from ta the fruit merely because he knows that he wi caught at it, and punished for it, that is not a act; but if he resists the temptation from conscien motives, his act is moral, and it is certainly an a faith. He declares his belief in a principle of which ought to govern his conduct. That princip right is something that his eyes cannot see, of whi can have no scientific evidence. His senses crav fruit, but his moral sense forbids him to take it, a rejects the pleasure which is seen, and cleaves t right which is unseen.

Now, in every moral act this principle come more or less plainly. The moral imperative is a s ual and not a physical force. The law of right i vealed to faith and not to sense. And all mo consists in the preference of this unseen and e right to some gratification which is seen and tem tsome pleasure which allures us, or some present good wich tempts us.

Now, if faith is the motive power in our earthly enterpses, if it is the very substance of our morality, it is n surely irrational that it should be made the foundatn of our religious life. If we do walk by faith, and n by sight in all our business ventures; if it is better fe us in these affairs that we should walk by faith and n by sight; if it is by faith rather than by sense or bknowledge that we are ruled whenever we perform a nral act, then it is not irrational to say that in those ccerns of the soul which deal with the profounder nsteries of existence, it is better for us to believe than tlee. If the method of faith is a method on which we nst constantly rely in things earthly, why may we not tst it in things heavenly?

An Unreasonable Demand

A great deal is said in these days in disparagement ofaith. Science is the name to conjure with, and sci- e is often regarded as the antithesis of faith. Men a denounced in the harshest terms for believing anytl:g which cannot be scientifically demonstrated. But nhing is plainer than that we do and must act every d upon beliefs that are not demonstrable. All I ask isnat men will apply the same rule to religious affairs tlt they are compelled to apply to their secular affairs; tlt they should not insist upon a measure of certainty in he one department of life which they never think of d anding in the other.

I suppose that I may be speaking to some persons w have refused to enter upon the religious life for tl reason. The evidences of the truth of Christianity d not amount, in their minds, to a demonstration. Tey want absolute proof, and they will not commit tlmselves to Christian discipleship until they have it. Tut, my friends, you will never have. You will never b able to tell to a mathematical certainty what the tth is concerning the heavenly life and its prospects a more than you are able to tell to a mathematical crainty what the truth is concerning the earthly life a its prospects. You must be satisfied with probabilits in both cases. You would not engage in any busins enterprise if, on the whole, the probabilities apred to be against succeeding in it. Neither should y commit yourself to the service of Christ if, on the wle, it seems probable to you, after a candid examnion of the evidence, that this religion is a delusion o an imposture; but if there is a reasonable probabilit that it is true, you are warranted in embracing it, e n though it may not seem to you absolutely certain. I there is good ground for believing that Christianity iswhat it claims to be you ought to accept it, even tlugh you may not clearly see and positively know tlt is true. And I am sure that there are some of y will admit at once that there is a strong probability in favor of the essential truth of this religion, a probability much stronger than you ever have to rest upon in your earthly affairs.

When you look over the world and see what Christianity has done for the races and the nations that have accepted it; when you see what effect the Bible has upon the communities where it is read and upon the characters of the men who make it the rule of their lives, you feel that there are very strong reasons for believing not only that it is true, but that it is the very highest truth which has ever been given to the world. And when you take the great doctrines of the Bible, and think them over one by one, weighing them carefully, you are convinced that the balance of probability is on their side.

It is more reasonable to believe that the world had its origin in intelligence than to believe that it is the result of the blind action of unreasoning forces. That is not only the verdict of common sense, but of a careful and candid philosophy. John Stuart Mill, a man who was always known as an unbeliever and who was commonly supposed to be an Atheist, declared in the last essay that he ever wrote "that in the present state of our knowledge the adaptations in Nature afford a large balance of probability in favor of creation by intelligence." And if there be an intelligent Creator, then it is not incredible that he should have revealed himself to us, both in the words of the Bible and by the manifestation of his Life in the Person of Jesus Christ. Indeed it is scarcely credible that he should not have made himself known unto us by some such revelations; and if these things are so, then all the great facts of our religion are true, and its claims upon us are not to be put aside.

Truth Verified in Practice

Now if you will take these probabilities and act upon them, believing that to be true which looks reasonable, even though you cannot demonstrate its truth, I know that your faith will be strengthened at every step you take. Faith will bring its own evidence, until at length your reasonable probability shall come to be a moral certainty, and you shall feel as sure of the truth of the Gospel of Christ as you can be of any truth of history or any doctrine of philosophy.

Christianity is practical truth, truth which is meant to be put in practice, and the verification of it, therefore, is in practice. You must have probable evidence that it is true, of course, before you accept it, and your reason will furnish you that probable evidence; but the only convincing proof is that which we obtain by testing it in our lives. When a man prays, day after day, for strength to resist temptation, and knows that his prayers are answered; when in great and repeated trials, he asks for patience to bear them, and finds the strength he asks for; when by months and years of steady trust in the Spiritual Christ, he proves his helpfulness; and knows that his vision has been cleared, and his courage strengthened, and his will established in righteousness, by his faith, then it is very hard to make him believe that his religion is a delusion or an imposture. He has evidence of its truth which satisfies him. Yet, in all this experience of his, there have been no physical demonstrations, no miracles, no raptures, no marvelous manifestations of supernal light; it is not upon any such signs and wonders as these that his assurance rests; it is upon his steady personal experience of the help of God in bearing trouble, in resisting evil, in living a just and a generous life.

Best Evidence of Discipleship

A good woman told me one day of a remarkable experience through which she passed years ago. As she prayed, it seemed to her that the Saviour stood in her very presence—it was almost as if she could see him with the natural eye; it was almost as if she heard the words that he spoke to her; and the bright vision filled her soul with a pure and perfect joy. And she was mourning when she talked with me, because the vision did not return. For such experiences as this a great many hearts are longing. If they could only dream a dream or see a vision, they would be satisfied. Well, my friends, it may be some satisfaction to have seen such marvels; but remember that the Saviour's beatitude is for them who have not seen, and yet have believed. If you know that you are willing now to trust his word and to do his will, you have better evidence of discipleship than if you had seen all the miracles of the mediæval saints and all the visions of the Apocalypse.

Read that record roll of the old worthies which is kept for us in the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews, and note that the proof of the saintship of every one of them was faith, and faith alone. Their faith in the promises of God alone is mentioned, their trust in his power and his love. The marvels that they saw, none of us may see; but we can believe God's word just as they did. And we have far better reasons for believing it than they had—forty centuries full of proofs of God's faithfulness—blazing with the glory of his mighty working in all the world.

Begin the Christian life, then, my friend, in this humble and trusting way. Don't look for marvels! Don't ask for raptures! Believe the word of the Lord because it is his Word, and because he cannot lie. He says that he will help you to overcome your sins. Believe him and prove him. He says that he will help you to bear your troubles. Trust him and try him! He says that he will give you strength for labor, courage for conflict, grace sufficient for every day. Take him at his word, and you shall know for yourself how blessed they are who, though they have not seen, have yet believed!

A MISSIONARY FAREWELL

A FAREWELL service for the Rev. Charles E. Hurlburt, President of the Africa Inland Mission, and his twelve missionaries, who sailed November 1st for British East Africa, was held the preceding evening, October 31st, at the Church of the Strangers, on West Fifty-seventh Street, New York, Rev. Charles E. Hurlburt presiding.

The opening prayer was offered by Mr. S. Whittemore. After singing, the Rev. S. H. Hadley, of the Water Street Mission, stirred all hearts with an address which emphasized the necessity of letting God have the pre-eminence in whatever we attempt to do. He was followed by Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson in a very impressive and heart-stirring address regarding God's solemn obligations, especially toward spreading the Gospel abroad.

Rev. Charles E. Hurlburt then gave a brief but comprehensive statement concerning the entire work of the Africa Inland Mission from its incipiency, which could not fail to interest the large audience present. He declared that God was in the work, and the divine favor had attended it at every step. Dr. A. E. Kittredge, of Madison Avenue, was the next speaker, and he showed the other side of the picture so powerfully portrayed a few moments before by Dr. Pierson, when presenting the grave needs of the heathen world. His remarks were concluded by a message of song full of cheer and comfort to the outgoing missionaries, by Rev. Frank K. Hawley and wife.

The closing words were given by Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, the well-known founder of the Door of Hope, and Mrs. Abbie C. Morrow. Mrs. Whittemore addressed the missionaries, committing them to God with much depth of feeling, and summing up the desire of her heart through the expressive words found in Numbers 6: 24-26. Then, addressing the audience with much earnestness, she urged upon one and all to hold themselves in readiness before God at all times, for the furtherance of his cause throughout the world. Mrs. Morrow, in a few sentences, unfolded the love of God in her usual characteristic, happy way.

Before the final prayers, offered by Rev. Dr. James and Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, twenty persons arose in various parts of the church to offer themselves as candidates for the foreign field.

The inspiring service was finally concluded by the pronouncing of the benediction by Rev. George E. Cully.

The outgoing missionaries include Mr. and Mrs. William P. Knapp and infant daughter, and Mr. Charles F. Johnston returning and his bride, the latter a new missionary. The other new missionaries are Mr. and Mrs. Fred McKenrick and infant daughter, Mr. Oren H. Scouten, Miss Florence Minch, Miss Nellie Rosenstock, Miss Maude Kale and Miss Josephine Hope. The Mission has some seven stations in Africa at the present time and the work is growing. Two of the chapels now in use were founded with funds provided by the Door of Hope. Rev. Charles S. Hurlburt is President of the Mission Home Council, which has its headquarters at 5930 Thompson Street, Philadelphia.

Russia's Struggle for Freedom

Riot and Disorder Mark the Fight for Civil Liberty---Finland and Poland Seek Independence---The Czar's Manifesto

ON October 30, the world was thrilled by the news, flashed by the cable from St. Petersburg, that the Russian autocracy had come to an end. Nicholas, the Czar, confronted by the passive revolt of his whole empire, and eager to avert the utter wreck of his dynasty, only saved the situation by the unconditional surrender of his autocratic power, and by yielding to the popular demand for a constitutional government. The final step was taken not a moment too soon; indeed, it is not certain, even now, that the great reforms that are now apparently guaranteed will suffice to arrest the revolution. All Russia is like a mass of smouldering tinder, which needs but a breath to blow it into furious conflagration.

Immediately after the issue of the Czar's manifesto, the nation was in suspense for the moment, as though stunned by the greatness of the concessions. It was generally recognized that the manifesto, though it had to be wrung from the throne, was a sweeping document in its pledges of political liberty, of popular representation in a National Assembly, of full suffrage and the promise of a Constitution to be drafted by a Congress elected by the people. These were ample, under any ordinary conditions, to have restored peace to a disturbed nation; but Russia's perturbation was too deep-seated to be quickly tranquilized by brilliant promises from the throne. There was the bitter remembrance of former experiences and disappointments. Thus the manifesto was criticised both favorably and unfavorably. Many held that it was satisfactory and complete, and that the government should be granted time to carry it out; but the larger number declared that it came too late to save the throne. Riotous crowds at the capital, in Moscow and other cities were demanding amnesty for all political offenders, and the removal of the brutal Cossacks. Strikes continued at all the great industrial centres and street fighting was reported at many different points. There were rumors of mutiny in army and navy. The fate of the empire hung tremblingly in the balance. Russia shuddered as her people contemplated the possibility of an experience like that of France during "The Terror."

This was the situation, when the intelligence was gazetted that Count Witte had been appointed as President of the Ministerial Council, and entrusted by the Czar with the carrying out of the new programme of national reforms. This news was well received by the people, who regard Witte as their friend, and a safe, just and able statesman.

Speculation was rife as to the probable complexion of the new Cabinet. Would it be reactionary, like its predecessors,or conservative and merely a makeshift? Or would it be a real reform Cabinet, one that could be depended upon to serve the whole nation instead of truckling to the bureaucracy? About this time strange and ominous rumors began to circulate. First, it was stated that General Trepoff, the bitter foe of the revolutionists and the man whose iron hand has been responsible for the slaughter of many defenseless men and women, under the plea of military necessity, had renounced his allegiance to the autocracy and would henceforth co-operate loyally with Witte. This was soon followed by reports that Trepoff had resigned, the latter finally proving true. Next came the equally surprising information that M. Pobiedonostzeff, the Procurator-General of the Holy Synod, the evil genius of both Alexander and Nicholas, and the most persistent opponent of liberal ideas in all Russia, had resigned. He had seen the star of the Romanoffs setting, as he supposed, and the surrender of the "sacred prerogatives" of the throne—to uphold which the Procurator had made himself cordially hated—convinced him that his own public career was at an inglorious end.

Meanwhile, a condition of affairs bordering upon anarchy continued to prevail in many of the cities. At Riga, police and rioters were in collision. At Odessa, Cossacks and the police together ploughed up street gatherings with bullets, and the people erected barricades. At Warsaw, the troops refused to fire on the people. At Moscow, the telegraph wires were cut and the water supply disconnected; the troops were mutinous and a bread famine was impending. There were frequent clashes between the students and the monarchical party, and the university was in a state of siege. At the same time, dragoons were sabering crowds in different parts of the city, and bands of thugs were committing depredatians and terrorizing people in unprotected districts. Even the capital itself was in a state of incipient anarchy, for the day following the manifesto, distrust of Count Witte and the new regime bred a powerful reaction, and mobs with red flags began to parade the principal thoroughfares. They marched toward the Winter Palace, singing revolutionary songs, while other mobs favoring the government were also marching and singing, "God save the Czar." Gen. Trepoff had ordered the national flags to be hung out for a public celebration over the granting of a constitution; but it was a holiday of violence and street brawls. In the dark streets at night, the electric lighting plant being temporarily disabled, there were collisions with the troops, and careful householders who did not wish to risk a rush of Cossack cavalry, kept indoors and barricaded their houses.

At this time it looked as though the concessions by the government had been in vain and that the much-dreaded revolution had come. Count Witte summoned to meet him some thirty of the leading editors of the St. Petersburg newspapers. He asked them to use their influence in restoring quiet to the country, and in bringing about the desired reforms peacefully. Some agreed, while others received his remarks coolly. Several spoke frankly of the various promises that had been made from time to time, only to be broken. Something should be done now to win public confidence. They recommended a general amnesty to all political prisoners, the withdrawal of the troops, the relaxation of martial law, the summary removal of Trepoff and the granting of freedom of the press as measures essential to show the good faith of the government. Premier Witte replied that time must be allowed to make those changes. He spoke earnestly, and the difficulty of his position was comprehended by all.

But suggestions of moderation were useless when the nation was in the mood of madness. Intoxicated with the sense of a new power, the mobs surged in the streets and all sorts of excesses were committed. Police and Cossacks fired at random and the snow streets were dabbled with the blood of their victims. Indeed, the Cossacks seemed to be subject to no law, and they volleyed and sabered, trampled and knouted and trampled the crowds apparently from sheer love of bloodshed. Some of the scenes described by correspondents, seem to have rivalled the wildest moments of the French Revolution. In Odessa frightful anti-Semitic riots took place. There were hours when frantic mobs of so-called loyalists, ultra-revolutionists, anti-Semites, Jews, Cossacks and police were all mingled together in inextricable confusion—a fighting, incongruous mass—with here and there a doctor or a nurse faithfully tending the wounded. The Cossacks mowed down the crowds wherever they were thickest, and from 500 to 1,000 were reported to have fallen under their cruel volleys. At Kief, fifty were killed in the riots, and the Czar's portrait was torn down from the town hall. At Moscow, Ekaterinoslav, Bielostok, Rostoff and several other cities, crowds compelled the jailers to release the political prisoners.

The revolution was not confined to Russia proper. In Finland, where the people had been awaiting an opportunity to strike for freedom, there was an omi[nous] rising when the news of the manifesto was received. Crowds blocked the streets of Helsingfors, the capital, demanding the resignation of Prince Obolensky, the Governor-General. That official, anxious to avoid the coming storm, tried to leave for St. Petersburg, but was prevented by the crowds, which blocked his path to the steamer, and he was forced to take refuge in his palace, a virtual prisoner. When he told a delegation of the people that a new regime was to be inaugurated in Finland,he was greeted with cries of "Too late! Too late!" Two days after the manifesto, Obolensky formally abdicated in presence of all the Singfors. The Russian flag was lowered from the public buildings and the Finnish flag raised in its place. Thus by popular assent, did Finland declare its independence!

It does not seek absolute separation from Russia, but the re-establishment of its constitutional rights which existed before the "Russification" of the province, including universal suffrage, a house assembly of the people, and other reforms.

Poland, too, has begun to agitate for freedom, and the scenes in Warsaw recall the insurrection of 1863. Great processions, carrying the flag of independent Poland and headed by priests, paraded the streets. Some troops attacked a procession, killing four and wounding many persons, and excitement over the occurrence drew a great crowd to the city hall where the soldiers were in position. The latter fired, killing thirty and injuring over one hundred. The governor has a considerable military force at his disposal, and should the agitation extend terrible scenes may follow. He claims to be able to control the revolutionists.

As far as the general outlook in Russia proper is concerned, it is generally believed that when the present excitement has passed over, the country will quiet down and await the fulfilment of the promises by the throne and the carrying out of the programme outlined in the manifesto. A single indication of bad faith on the part of the government will act as a spark to a powder magazine, and may be the means of setting all Russia ablaze in a revolution, to which the present agitation would be e child's play. It is practically certain that the workingmen's organizations will maintain their present attitude until complete political amnesty is granted, and they are fully satisfied of the good faith of the new regime. They have terminated the strike on all the railroads. There is, meanwhile, the gravest danger that the extreme revolutionists may succeed in forcing the country into open revolt, in spite of all concessions; but Premier Witte and those around him are working hopefully. Some of the ablest statesmen in Europe have expressed the fear that the Witte ministry will be short-lived. The Czar remains at Peterhof, where he is closely guarded; but there are renewed rumors that he is prepared for flight, should the worst happen.

On Nov. 2, a proclamation was issued defining the liberty of the press, and the Czar signed a political amnesty measure, excluding, however, political murderers. Thousands of prisoners were freed by this royal mandate. The proclamation states that the government counts upon public support in its efforts to restore tranquillity, and that until the new reform measures are prepared, present laws must stand. It renews its pledge to abide faithfully by the conditions of the manifesto of October 30. At last accounts, the capital was quieting down, and there were signs of the excitement subsiding in other cities.

The First Zemstvo Congress

From the 25th to the 28th of September last, there met in the Palace Nossiltzew, at Moscow, a Congress of representatives of the Zemstvo and the State Government. This was held in pursuance of the reforms conceded by the throne. Finland and Poland were not represented. 113 Zemstvos and 660 of the State Government took part. The authorization for this assembly had been granted by the Minister of the Interior, and it was stipulated that a member of the General Government of Moscow should be personally present at the Congress, so that it might be understood that the Ministry sanctioned the programme, which was not to be changed. The chief of the Chancellery of the General Government of Moscow, Chamberlain Moronin, attended the session, dressed in his uniform; but even he did not find it necessary to change the programme, which was carried through in perfect parliamentary form. Among the prominent members of the Congress were the brothers Dolgorukow, Count Schachowskoi, Professor Miljukow, Professor of Civics, Maxim Kovalewskij; the Priest Petrow, General Kusmin-Karawajew, Professor of the Military Academy, Count Heyden; Golowin, Roditschew, Pole Wroblewski, Professor Koschkin, and Professor Lietschitzkij.

On the 25th of September a resolution was passed that even if the Congress, according to the statute of August 19th, was not really a National Assembly, yet it was necessary that the Russian citizens, who, in the meetings of the Zemstvo and the representatives of the people, had undertaken to carry out the programme, should set aside all factious divisions in the interest of civic freedom and justice, and in order to secure the establishment of national representation and the support of the principles announced in the Congress of the Zemstvos.

A lively debate took place on the 26th of September over the political programme for the voting campaign, which included the following points: Declaration of citizen and human rights, universal suffrage, equal rights for all classes and nationalities, inviolability of person and home, abolition of passports, popular representation with upper and lower house on a democratic basis, control of the Government budget, reorganization of the Zemstvo, publicity of all legal proceedings, abolition of the death sentence, reduction of military and naval expenditures. On the 27th of September, the Congress declared the necessity of granting to all nationalities in Russia the right to use their own language and dialect in open living as well as in assemblies and clubs—the Russian language, however, to remain the language of all the central institutions and of the army and navy. A declaration was also made in favor of a legislative assembly and universal suffrage for Poland. The Congress also discussed the form of an electoral manifesto, advocating a reform in education for the people, workingmen's insurance, and regulations for the selling and distribution of land to those who till the soil. This was the first people's congress ever held in Russia.

The Senate Building, Helsingfors, Finland

The Czar's manifesto of October 30, is as follows:

"We, Nicholas II, by the grace of God, Emperor and Autocrat of All the Russias, Czar of Poland, Grand Duke of Finland, etc., declare to all our faithful subjects that the troubles and agitation in our capital and numerous other places fill our heart with great and painful sorrow. The happiness of the Russian sovereign is indissolubly bound up with the happiness of the people, and the sorrow of the people is the sorrow of the sovereign.

"From the agitations may arise a great national disorganization and menace to the integrity and unity of our empire. The supreme duty imposed on us by our sovereign mission requires us to efface ourself, and with all our reason and all our power to hasten the cessation of the troubles so dangerous to the State.

"Having directed the different authorities to take steps to prevent open manifestations of disorder, excesses and violence, and to protect our peaceful subjects, who are anxious for the quiet accomplishment of the duty which lies upon us all, we have recognized that in order to assure the success of general measures for the pacification of public life, it is indispensable to co-ordinate and unify the powers of the central government.

"We, therefore, direct the government to carry out our inflexible will in the following manner:

"1. To grant the population the immutable foundations of civic liberty based on the real inviolability of the person, and freedom of conscience, speech, union and association.

"2. Without deferring the elections to the State Duma (assembly) already ordered, to call to participation in the Duma, as far as possible, in view of the shortness of time before the Duma is assembled, those classes of the population now completely deprived of electoral rights, leaving the development of the principle of electoral rights in general to the newly established legislative order of things.

"3. To establish it as an immutable rule that no law can come into force without the approval of the State Duma, and that it shall be possible for the elected of the people to exercise real participation in the supervision of the legality of the acts of the authorities appointed by us.

"The Government is to abstain from any interference with the elections to the Duma, and is to keep in view our sincere desire for the realization of the ukase of December 25, 1904. It must maintain the prestige of the Duma and confidence in its labors, and not resist its decisions, so long as they are not inconsistent with the historic greatness of Russia. One must identify oneself with the ideas of a great majority of society, and not with the echoes of noisy groups and factions, too often unstable. It is especially important to secure the reform of the Council of the Empire on an electoral principle.

"I believe that in the exercise of the executive power the following principles should be embodied:

"1. Sincerity in the confirmation of civil liberty and in providing guarantees for its maintenance.

"2. A tendency toward the abolition of exclusive laws.

"3. The co-ordination of activity of all the organs of government.

"4. The avoidance of repressive measures respecting proceedings which do not openly menace society or the State.

"5. Resistance to acts which manifestly threaten society or the State, such resistance being based upon the law and on moral unity with a reasonable majority of society. Confidence must be placed in the political tact of Russian society. It is impossible that society should desire a state of anarchy which would threaten the addition of all the horrors of civil strife and the dismemberment of the empire.

"We appeal to all the faithful sons of Russia to remember their duty toward the fatherland and to aid in bringing an end to these unprecedented troubles, and to apply all their forces in co-operation with us to restore calm and peace upon our natal soil.

"Given at Peterhof, October 17 (O. S.), 1905, in the eleventh year of our reign. NICHOLAS."

The Russian Situation

RUSSIA is now facing the gravest crisis in her history since the foundation of the empire—a crisis beside which the disastrous war with Japan is a mere incident, although it has doubtless been precipitated by that ill-advised campaign. She is now at the crossways that lead to Reform or Revolution—the one to a free and comparatively contented people under constitutional government; the other to anarchy, confusion and chaos.

Although the Czar's manifesto comes at the eleventh hour, it undeniably brings hope to Russia. He has sowed the wind and reaped the whirlwind; but even yet he may be master of the situation, if, after the present paroxysm of madness dies down, the new reforms are carried out in good faith. Within a month, the same crowds that are now execrating his name may be shouting plaudits to the "Little Father" and kissing the ground he walks on. If he be true to the people, he may weather the storm in safety, though Russia will nevermore be a despotism but a constitutional monarchy. Should he again prove weak and vacillating, and false to these pledges so solemnly given, it will be well-nigh impossible to keep back the Niagara of revolution that, once let loose, will engulf nobles, princes, bureaucracy and the very throne itself.

Russia is an incongruous mass of nationalities, held together by no racial ties, but by the bonds forged by might and organized militarism. Many of these races have cherished the dream of regaining their lost independence, and two—the Finns and the Poles—have already struck the blow that may end in a measure of independence, if not in complete separation. A few more weeks will tell to the world whether order is to be restored or the drama is to be played out to the bitter end.

Christian Union

FROM every city and hamlet in our land, wherever there is found a Christian church, or individual followers of our Lord, there should go up to the Throne of Grace an earnest petition that God will bless the deliberations of the great Conference, which, on this day, commences its sessions in New York. As our readers learned, from the article published in these pages four weeks ago, it is an Inter-church Conference on Federation, designed to bring about a closer relation between the Protestant communions of the country. If it succeeds in its purpose it will introduce a new era in our religious life, by bringing into alliance the activities of the various churches, now laboring singly and independently, in a common cause, for our common Lord.

This purpose commends itself specially to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. No religious journal comprises in its constituency so large a variety of creeds and denominational affiliations. In spite of the efforts of zealous friends to narrow its scope it has maintained its principle of broad tolerance, and has steadfastly refused to become the organ of any one denomination. It has proved the possibility of serving Christians of every name, promoting religious life, encouraging the downcast and stimulating spiritual activity. It has also demonstrated by the enterprises of benevolence and relief it has inaugurated, that Christians of all denominations can unite in the common object of alleviating suffering from famine and other calamities. Episcopalians and Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists, Disciples and Congregationalists have cordially united under its auspices, without distinction of creed, to feed the starving, to relieve the destitute and to succor the widow and the fatherless. Having witnessed the success of their united efforts they are prepared to hail with hope the attempt of the churches themselves to find common ground for union.

There is encouragement, too, in what the churches have already accomplished by harmonious action. There has been no clashing of creeds in the American Bible Society, in the Evangelical Alliance, in the Sunday School Union, in the Young Men's Christian Association, in the Christian Endeavor Society; and when missionaries of every denomination came together in the Ecumenical Conference five years ago, it was found that they could work together to plan a more vigorous campaign in heathen lands for the kingdom of Christ. In all these organizations it has been found that the differences that separate are superficial, and that deep down in the heart they are one in loyalty to Christ. One reveres John Wesley, another reverences Calvin, but all own Christ as their King. As the apostle reminded his followers, Christ is not divided; it was not Paul that was crucified for the world.

The lesson has been learned and now comes the effort to give it practical shape. Looking out on the world with the stupendous difficulties the Church has to encounter, the wisdom of uniting its forces is compelling recognition. The awful problems of intemperance and vice, of poverty and greed, of scepticism and spiritual darkness, must be met, and it is the business of the church to solve them. Each denomination is trying its utmost, but it has failed. What may we not hope from a united effort? Let the foremost men in each communion, the men of warm hearts, of sagacious minds, of consecrated loyalty, get together. Each may hug his special denominational shibboleth, no one asks him to abandon that, but in the face of the sorrow and suffering and sin and misery, weltering all around us, let them in God's name forget their differences and cordially unite in hearty comradeship to do Christ's work in the world. So shall his pathetic prayer be fulfilled, "That they all may be one."

Capital Punishment Again

IN a letter to this journal, referring to our Symposium on Capital Punishment, Mr. Eben Bumstead, Secretary of the Boston Civic Committee, takes issue with the advocates of life imprisonment, instead of the death penalty, and says in part:

> Only Christ can bring in a millennium of peace wherein killing may cease; law never can. What then is the end sought by the capital punishment law? It is to lessen the crime of murder to a minimum. And this end is gained, not as you say we claim, "by killing," but it is gained by the promulgation of law. The announcement of the penalty of death for murder by the lawgiver is a warning to every vicious person of certain death if he disobeys and takes human life. And this warning proclaimed by the law before the commission of crime is effective in deterring many from staining their hands with blood. Thus it is not "by killing" that murder is discouraged and the crime lessened, but by the proclamation of the law threatening to visit the extreme penalty upon the guilty. The execution is the carrying out of the threat of the law. It supports the law. And when the capital punishment law is supported by the prompt execution of all murderers, then the awful crime is rarely committed. For THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to give currency to epithets as "relic of barbarism," "uncivilized," etc. is accusing somewhat dangerously a statute which God has himself made and honored in Holy Scripture, which Moses repromulgated and enforced, which the righteous kings of Israel inflicted, which Christ in his own body became subject to in his execution on the Cross and which he had before taught was not abolished (Matt. 5: 17, 18), and which he honored by extending its scope over even those who are angry with brethren without cause (Matt. 5: 21, 22).

In view of the fact that a majority of the contributors to the Capital Punishment Symposium recorded themselves as favoring its abolition, we willingly accord Mr. Bumstead the privilege of ranking with the minority. It is unfortunate for his argument, however, that not only is the opinion of the enlightened and humane majority against him in this particular case, but in his appeal to Scripture he has certainly overlooked the fact that the Almighty, in dealing with the very first murderer, set a precedent for all time. He did not destroy him, but placed a mark upon Cain, "lest any finding him should kill him." He permitted him to live, and presumably to repent of his evil deed. The reference to the Saviour's death on the Cross is even more unfortunate, for the writer should have remembered that even that foulest of all crimes wrung from our Lord's dying lips no sentence of death against the criminals, but the memorable words of sublime sorrow and pity: "Father, forgive them. They know not what they do."

Our Massachusetts advocate of capital punishment appeals to the law of Moses. Why not appeal to the whole instead of a fragment of that inexorable code? Would the Massachusetts Civic Committee be willing to go on record as demanding the death penalty for gathering sticks on the Sabbath? (See Numbers 15:32-36.) There were other offenses, now deemed trivial, for which human life was forfeited in the wilderness stage of Hebrew civilization. Are we to understand that t[hese] are still considered good laws by the Massachusetts [Civic] Committee for these days of ours?

The great truth, which our friends have appare[ntly] lost sight of, is that, under the Christian dispensa[tion], the race has advanced and is taking a broader visi[on] of its own mission here. Crime, or a large part of [it] is the product of ill-assorted social conditions, and we [are] in duty bound to improve these conditions and to gi[ve] a helping hand to those who have suffered becaus[e] of them. Mercy and humanity must temper judgm[ent]. Our duty to the criminal, as Christians and good ci[ti]zens, is to help reform him, not to exterminate [him]. His crime, however vile it may be, cannot justify an[other] crime. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord. I [will] repay." We pray for the coming again of our D[ear] Lord and Master; we pray for the millennium; why [not] pray also that wars and murders and their concomi[tant], legal executions, may cease from the earth?

One Speech Enough

SAYS The Interior of Chicago, in a recent issue:

> At the Mormon General Conference at Salt Lake City, Se[nator] Reed Smoot declared grandiloquently "that while such a[postles] and worshipers as himself surrounded President Joseph F. S[mith], giving him their love and devotion, no traitor could ever b[e] lay him to the nation's vengeance." Yet Smoot heard Smith at W[ash]ington last winter admit that he was living in continued an[d] determined violation not only of the laws of State and Natio[n] but even of the categorically "revealed" law of the church of w[hich] he is the head. And Senator Smoot, being sworn as a Fe[deral] official to uphold the statutes and Constitution of the U[nited] States, publicly announces his prior devotion to this monum[ental] lawbreaker, and brands as traitorous and vengeful any po[ssible] attempt to make the man keep the law.
> This one speech alone is sufficient to demonstrate Smoot's [per]unfitness for the Senate, and if the Senators do not exclud[e him] now, they should every one be degraded themselves from [their] office at the earliest opportunity.

It is true, before now, men have been cast out [of] loyal representative assemblies for a single offe[nsive] utterance, ay, for one treasonable sentence. But [while] we agree with our contemporary that the speech refe[rred] to, and which was delivered by Senator Smoot at [the] Mormon General Conference, if correctly reported, [was] altogether inconsistent with his oath as a Senator o[f the] United States, and with his duty as a loyal citizen, [we] would remind The Interior that the essential obje[ction] raised by the women of America to his continuanc[e as] a member of the Senate, is not based upon a singl[e ex]pression.

Senator Smoot is an apostle of the Mormon Ch[urch], sworn by a secret oath that compels him to give his [first] duty and service to the interests of the hierarchy. [That] hierarchy of which he is the representative, is the [an]tagonist of our government and institutions; it st[ands] for polygamy, and its representative, while not pe[rson]ally a polygamist, is bound to defend and up[hold] the brutal system of women slavery which has [made] Utah a by-word and a shame. Further, he is b[ound] by his oath to uphold the men who, as heads of [the] Mormon Church, admitted before the Senate Comm[ittee] in Washington that they were living in violatio[n of] "the laws of God and man." He is bound to de[fend] them in the course they have followed, which ha[s re]sulted in Utah as a State breaking her sacred pl[edge] to this government. His Conference address in [pas]sing adulation of President Smith, whom The Interior j[ustly] terms a "monumental law-breaker," simply con[firms] the charges already made in the Women's Memo[rial]. No Mormon Apostle should be permitted to make [laws] for the American people.

—ANNIE R. TAYLOR, the famous missionary to T[ibet], now visiting England, writes to Dr. Klopsch: "[Will] you ask for prayer for Tibet, that the Indian Go[vern]ment may be led to grant the same privileges to mis[sion]aries as to traders in Tibet, and that we may not [only] have an open door, but open hearts to receive the [mes]sage?"

The BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Norway's King

FROM Norway comes the news, of which there was an intimation several weeks ago, that the crown is to be offered to Prince Charles of Denmark. By a vote of 87 to 29 the Storthing, the Norwegian legislature, has authorized the Cabinet to open negotiations with the Prince. He is the second son of the heir to the Danish throne. He is thirty-three years of age and is married to a daughter of King Edward of England. Probably his intimate relationship to the two constitutional kings has influenced the Norwegian people in their choice. A second consideration was doubtless their friendly relations with Denmark to which they were formerly united. Their language and literature are more nearly allied to those of Denmark than they were to those of Sweden. It will, therefore, be gratifying to Norway, now that it is to have a king of its own, that he should be a Danish prince.

The terms in which the Storthing stated its decision, indicate that pledges will be required of the new king. It is a new thing in Europe that there should be "negotiations" between a people and the king who is to rule over them. It seems to imply that he will have to agree to rule according to the Constitution, and consent to certain restrictions to his power. Over and above all, the choice will have to be ratified by a popular vote. That a king can be made on these terms must be a shock to the Emperor William of Germany, whose ideas of sovereignty, like those of his grandfather, are that a king is a divinely appointed ruler whom the people are bound to obey. The Norwegians, however, show their wisdom and prudence in negotiating with their chosen king before they invest him with power. They have near at hand too striking an example of the evil of autocratic rule, and the miseries it has involved to the people of Russia, to intrust any man with unrestricted power.

That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand or to the left: to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he and his children (Deut. 17: 20).

Prince Charles of Denmark and His English Wife

Missionaries Massacred

The distressing news of the murder of five missionaries in China, which reached this country on Nov. 2, has caused sincere sorrow in all Christian homes. No details have come at the date of writing, but there is unhappily no reason for doubting the sad facts. The brief cable dispatch says that the tragedy occurred at Lien-Chow, a city of about 20,000 inhabitants, in the province of Kwang-Tung, China. It lies 300 miles north of Canton, and is reached only by boat, up a swift and winding river. The Presbyterian Board has had a permanent work there since 1886. There was no trouble there during the Boxer outbreak of 1900, and considerable progress had been made. Residences had been erected for the missionaries; two schools had been opened for boys and girls; a hospital for men and another for women had been built, and a church capable of accommodating 700 persons had just been completed. Dr. Edward Machie, of Cincinnati, Ohio, was in charge of the men's hospital. He was severely wounded, but escaped to the office of the Prefect, but his wife and daughter were killed. They had been in China since 1869. The woman's hospital was under the charge of Miss Eleanor Chestnutt, M.D., formerly of Parkville, Mo. She had done excellent work, and only last year treated 5,479 patients in the hospital. She also was one of the murdered band. The other two were Rev. John Rodgers Peale and his wife. They were new missionaries, who sailed from this country last August last, to begin work in China, and could not have been more than a few days at Lien-Chow. Why they were killed is inexplicable. There was another missionary at the station, Miss Ella J. Patterson, who was also a recent addition to the station. She, like Dr. Machie, escaped to the Prefect's house. Thus five valuable lives have been lost. They must have been the victims of some wild unreasoning outbreak, for their work had been beneficent and they had endeared themselves to the people. Like Him whom they served, they fell at the hands of the very people whom they were trying to save. In our sorrow for the sacrifice there is no room for vindictive feelings against the murderers. We have to say of them as Christ said:

Father, forgive them: they know not what they do (Luke 23:34).

Asleep on the Track

When the platform of the Subway station at Forty-second Street, New York, was crowded with waiting passengers, about midnight on October 23, a loud cry was raised. The people ran to the rear end of the platform to ascertain the cause, and found a man pointing excitedly to a dark object on the track. It was evidently a man lying, apparently dead, across the rails. The express was running in and the people shouted and signaled frantically to the motorman. He could not understand, but applied the brakes and brought the train to a stand about two feet from the man's body. Officers went down to look, and found that it was a man lying fast asleep. He was aroused and lifted to the platform. He proved to be one of the car-cleaners of the Subway, who had been drinking. A sudden fit of somnolence had come over him and he had thrown himself down for a nap. In his sane moments he must have known, from his occupation, the danger he incurred, but the liquor had clouded his senses and made him oblivious of his peril. It operates now as it did three thousand years ago, when the wise king uttered his warning:

Thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast (Prov. 23: 34).

Norwegians Voting on the Question of Separation from Sweden

Like a Phantom Ship

The White Star steamer Teutonic, which arrived at New York on October 25, reported passing in midocean a three-masted bark with no soul on board. The Teutonic passed within five miles of the derelict. The bark had upper and lower fore and maintopsails, three jibs, main topgallant spanker, and main topmast staysail set at the time. As the bark was keeping a straight course eastward, the wheel evidently was lashed. When seen she was flying an inverted ensign as a signal of distress. The officers leveled their glasses on the craft, but not a sign of life was seen. It is supposed that she was a vessel the crew of which was taken off by a Cunard liner a few days before. It was then believed that she was about to founder and that the only hope for the crew was to go on board the steamer. She is now sailing the sea without guidance, endangering other vessels and drifting to certain wreck. How many human beings there are in like condition, having rejected the guidance of their Maker.

It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps (Jer. 10: 23).

Sacrificed His Arm

A Brooklyn manufacturer was confronted with a terrible alternative one day last week. He is a maker of mouldings, and has in his workshop a large circular saw operated by steam. He had prepared a number of boards to be sawed up and had started up the saw. As he put one of them in position, a portion of his clothing was caught on the board and he was dragged toward the saw. It was impossible to stop it in the position he was in and equally impossible to release himself from the board. Instantly he realized that there was but one hope of saving his life. He would be cut in twain if he did not sacrifice his arm. Without a moment's hesitation he held his limb to the teeth of the saw and his arm was instantly amputated. Holding an apron that he snatched up to the bleeding member, he ran at his utmost speed to the nearest hospital, where the surgeons dressed the wound. He is said to be now in a fair way to recovery. Nothing but the instant decision to give up his arm could have saved his life. There are situations in moral life that require a similar sacrifice. A sin or an association that is dear as a limb has to be abandoned that the soul may be saved.

If thy hand cause thee to stumble, cut it off: it is good for thee to enter into life maimed rather than to go into hell (Mark 9:43, R. V.).

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

The Beauty of Women

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AMONG the assets which for ages have been the distinctive dower of women, personal beauty has always taken a very high place. Away back in the remotest shades of antiquity, the furious tides of war raged for years, with current and counter-current, over Helen of Troy. Helen, fairest among women, had been carried away by the Trojans from the Greeks, and the Greeks did battle for her, her beauty seeming, to all concerned, the fit excuse for the vast amount of trouble she caused, and the lavish outpouring of blood and treasure.

In a far later time the great beauty of Mary Stuart bewitched the hearts of Scotland, and it still casts its spell over the historic page, so that to this day men contend fiercely for Mary, or write bitterly against her, as though she were still living and breathing in the world. For a while, in fiction, it was the custom to make very little of the beauty of heroines. Charlotte Bronte set the fashion, and made her Jane Eyre a diminutive young woman with no looks to speak of, and only a charm of personality which was compelling enough to entrance the hearts of men. But the homely heroine has never maintained her vogue. Among the daughters of Eve and the sons of Adam there is an unspoken, unformulated, but very tangible sentiment in behalf of womanly beauty, and although we do not find it in real life, we demand it in the pages of novels.

These are supposed to be moving pictures of real life, and only as they are successful in portraying the actual do they maintain any hold upon our attention. Thus, in a romance published recently, entitled The Silence of Mrs. Harrold, the central figure is a young widow with whom a fellow passenger on an ocean steamer falls deeply in love. He is a hard-headed lawyer, a practical and extremely conventional man, yet before the ocean is crossed he has placed his heart at the disposal of a woman whose loveliness of person and of manner has taken him by storm, and he has joyfully consented to take her for his wife, while she positively denies to him all knowledge of her past life. This is a situation which could hardly be paralleled in reality, but which excuses itself in the book because the woman's wonderful beauty enthralls the reader, just as it does the people in the little drama where she occupies the front of the stage.

In Rose of the World, a book that appeared several years ago, the heroine was so stately, so dazzling, so altogether without a flaw in her grace and the glory of her golden hair, that we followed her breathlessly through the strangest conditions, and were enraptured to the very end of the story. Sorrow turned her golden hair to snowy white, but did not affect her beauty in the least, nor mar our conception of it.

In The House of Mirth, a book of amazing power, which has just been issued, the heroine, Lily Bart, a New York girl of to-day, and the victim from first to last of unkind fate and tyrannical circumstances, is so beautiful that her misfortunes pain us as they would not had she possessed a stumpy figure, a freckled face, and carroty hair.

In Peter's Mother, a recent story of English life, the heroine has eyes of sapphire bl[ue], a delicate complexion, and a [sl]lowy figure. She captivates [Ma]by the sheer power of her lov[ely] eyes, and soft, bewitching mann[er].

Shakespeare's women are almost always beauti[ful]. From the queenly Catherine, haughtily confront[ing] Cardinal Woolsey and Henry the Eighth, to her wi[ld] namesake in the Taming of the Shrew, Anne or Por[tia], Imogene or Desdemona, or whatever name the h[er]ine may bear, Shakespeare, who played divinely [on] every string of the human heart, knew too much [to] make his heroines other than beautiful. Fair wom[en] walk through the pages of Sir Walter Scott, meet [us] in the stories of Thackeray, and trail their shin[ing] garments through the verse of the poets from Dante [to] Tennyson.

Robert Louis Stevenson does not make all his wom[en] beautiful; but in Catriona, the lass with the steadf[ast] eyes of gray, whom David Balfour loved, he [has] painted a heroine whose beau[ty] will never fade. There may [be] two opinions as to the ideal beauty which Sir Edward Bur[ne]-Jones and Dante Gabriel Ro[s]setti had in mind when th[ey] painted their pictures, but th[ere] is this to be said, that whoev[er] looks long at a Burne-Jo[nes] maiden loses his heart to her.

People tell us with more [or] less conviction that comeline[ss] only skin deep, that handsom[e] that handsome does, and [that] beauty is a fading flower, [but] we notice that the young man['s] love always endows the girl [of] his choice with charm of fe[a]ture and figure, and that she is be[au]tiful in his eyes. Of one thi[ng] we may be almost certain, [and] that is that a spiteful, shrew[ish] disagreeable temper will in [time] spoil the most beautiful face, [and] that there is always the he[lp] for the plain girl that she [may] become beautiful when sh[e is] old, if she live a consistent, [har]monious and beautiful life.

THE BEARER OF ILL TIDINGS

Who comes across the snow to-day?
What dear one, long from home away,
Is brought unto the door?

Ah, tender wife, ah, mother old,
Life hath for both its woes untold,
When love returns no more.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—HOUSEKEEPER. If you [have] patience and strength, you [may] restore the polish of your piano by using cold water [and] a chamois skin. Take a little of the surface at a ti[me], rub it with a damp cloth, and then polish vigorously [with] the chamois. Almost all white net goods may be cle[an]ed by dipping them in flour and shaking them out.

A Personal Message from Dr. Klopsch

EVERY year The Christian Herald, by dint of exceptional business enterprise, is enabled to offer Premiums that cause even experienced publishers to exclaim: "How can they do it? How can they give so much value for so little money?" The explanation is found in the enormous quantities used. We never issue a work of which we print less than 25,000 Copies. Of a certain premium we issued as many as 150,000 volumes. This immense consumption enables us to secure our paper, printing and binding at the lowest figures, while the initial expenses, for authors, artists, etc., are distributed over this great output, reducing the charge against each volume or set to a veritable minimum.

But before I say anything concerning the remarkable premium propositions for this season, I would ask the members of the great Christian Herald Family—to whom every year I become, personally, more attached—to help me again this year, as you have in former years, by renewing, if possible, during the present month of November.

I fully appreciate the fact that, notwithstanding the unusual prosperity enjoyed by our country in many directions, there are those to whom it would not be quite convenient to comply with this request. There are, on the other hand, very many to whom the anticipation, by a few weeks, of what they already have in mind to do, would be a matter of comparative unimportance. Yet this would tend to greatly lighten (by distributing it over a longer period) the pressure upon me during the renewal season. This would also help me to personally supervise a much greater portion of the current business than I possibly could, were all the renewals to be sent in during December. It goes without saying that I shall be extremely grateful for any and every assistance that I may receive at your hands, in the shape of prompt renewal.

It will be well to also bear in mind that the transportation facilities are not now clogged by holiday pressure, and both mail and express service are, by all means, now safer and more satisfactory than during the month of December. This means that packages entrusted in November to either one will be properly delivered, and that there need be no misgivings as to shipments reaching their destination on time.

We are justly proud of our Premium Offers this year. Never before have we offered such variety and such value for the money. That superbly illustrated volume, The Cruise of the Eight Hundred; Dr. Banks' remarkably interesting work, entitled Capital Stories About Famous Americans; our new Popular Edition of the Red Letter Bible Without Helps, bound in grained black cloth, with highly polished red edges and gold stamp; our Red Letter New Testament, beautifully bound in flexible American Levant leather, and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (Red Line Holiday Edition)—any one of which goes with The Christian Herald for a whole year, including our Calendar, for only $2.00.

Then come our more ambitious efforts in the form of Masterpieces of the World's Best Literature (eight superb volumes and Book-rack to match); the irresistible two-volume Camp Life Library, for the boys and girls of The Christian Herald Family; our ever popular work, entitled Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts; our Christian Worker's Edition of the Red Letter Bible with Helps and Maps, any one of which goes with The Christian Herald for one year, and our beautiful Calendar, at $3.00.

If you select Camp Life Library, Pilgrim's Progress or Forty Thousand Sublime Thoughts, write the Title in the space left blank in the Form below.

And finally, we would direct your attention to our Money-Saving Magazine Combination offers. This array of bright, wide-awake, clean publications, offered at bargain prices in connection with The Christian Herald, emphasizes the importance of the Magazine Combination plan first introduced by the writer six years ago.

If you should not care for any of these Premiums or Magazines, we will send The Christian Herald and our Calendar at the usual price of $1.50.

Do not forget to read "Ten Timely and Important Questions Answered," printed at foot of opposite page.

As this message is already too lengthy, I must deny myself the privilege of saying many things that I had in my heart to say. But I will add just this (and I am addressing you as a subscriber and member of The Christian Herald Family): It would afford me, personally, great gratification to have you continue your membership for another year. We have great things in prospect. We want not only that you should share them with us, but we need your co-operation to bring them about. Every renewal strengthens us, every defection weakens us.

You cannot do better for yourself or your loved ones than to continue your membership in the great Christian Herald Family, and thus afford us, for at least another year, the encouragement of your company and co-operation. Cordially yours,

Wm. T. Klopsch

GENERAL PLAN OF THIS GREAT BIBLE

1. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Lord and Saviour are Printed in Red.
2. In the Old Testament, the passages printed in Red are those quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred.
3. Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.
4. A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament, indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

Why I Should Practice Abstinence

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

VE have within ourselves a scale more delicate than the letter scale. d-given judgment is the le-, and conscience is the bar by which we the weighing of matters as right or wrong. rections for using this scale were given the Apostle Paul to the Christians at rinth. That church was composed of two kinds of ple, Jews and Greeks. As might be expected, their ing of things as right and wrong was not alike. The ws had been trained from childhood to regard as sin- the eating of meat that had been offered to idols, ile the Greeks had been brought up to regard such at as the choicest to be had. As Christians, the eeks still continued to eat such meat. The Christian ws were scandalized by such procedure, and appealed the Apostle Paul to rule against the conduct of the eeks. Having been born in a Greek city, Tarsus, and Jewish parents, Paul was peculiarly fitted to consider h points of view. He wrote in a letter, to be read in church, that as brotherly love should prevail among ristians, and should restrain them from anything that uld do violence to the feeling of others, and perhaps ve them from the church, the Christian Greeks should tain from the eating of meat which had been offered idols, for the sake of others. As for himself, he wrote: f I thought the eating of meat would lead some of my low Christians to do wrong, I would eat no meat for rest of my life." And when the letter had been re- ved and read by the Christians in Corinth, the Greeks ly said: "We will have nothing more to do with the at that has been offered to idols."

On this World's Temperance Sunday, the question is a ater one than that between the Greeks and the Jews Corinth. Strong drink is orld-wide evil, and it is w "For God and home l every land" that we tain.

Illustration and Application

The lesson title bids us tain for the sake of oth-, and the Golden Text imates that we should o abstain for our own es, though we think we in no danger. Both se propositions are but velopments of the second eat commandment, "Thou lt love thy neighbor as self," which is a com- nd to do right for our ghbors' sake, and equally our own. And when our ghbors, especially the ung men and the reform- men, are prevented from taining by those who ke it their business to en- e others to drink, intelli- t love to our neighbor ls for the prohibition of se enticers. Under "no ense" no man is ever evented from importing oxicants for his own con- ption, but only from porting it to sell to ers.

1. Promoting Abstinence and Prohibition for the ke of Others. Not a drunkard lives to-day on earth t intended to be a drunkard. And yet, most drinkers nk themselves so strong they can safely dally with a that has slain many of the world's greatest poets and tesmen; and so appeal is in this lesson made to a gher motive: Abstain for the sake of others. "We t are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, d not to please ourselves." No one has a moral right do for pleasure what if all the world follows his exam- will produce more harm than good.

Many a noble man has given up a drink, in which he w no harm for himself, lest his example should lead me weaker brother to drunkenness. And surely, if ink were only a harmless pleasure it would not be worth ile to wreck even one life for both worlds to enjoy it, en there are so many pleasures in which there are no rils. No man should consider the saloon from an indi- dual point of view alone. Suppose it were true that ores of men who go to the saloon get no harm either om its intoxicants, its pictures, or its fellowships. The estion that every supporter of the saloon on the inside outside must face is, whether in its total effect the loon does not promote drunkenness, and impurity, and mbling, and Sabbath-breaking, and other social disor- rs. If I think it does not harm me, I must yet oppose because it will harm others, and society in general.

For the Sake of Your Family Abstain. Abstinence for the sake of others means far more to-day than the danger that my example may make somebody a drunkard. The scientists are telling us that worse than the monthly pay-day drunk of the laborer, is the daily tippling of those who bring themselves to the condition defined as "alcoholism," by keeping the cells of the body waterlogged with daily portions of wine and beer, whose consequences are not only kidney diseases and others in the "moderate drinker" himself, but also epilepsy, and idiocy, and insanity, and other awful bequests of heredity in his children's children, for whose sake especially he should abstain.

I should like to paint as a young tippler's dream, his unborn children coming to him with the pledge, and saying, "Please sign it for our sakes." There is an old chronicle of the days of witchcraft which tells that in Badburg, of Bavaria, an arrested man confessed that the devil had given him a girdle by which he could change himself into a wolf. As a wolf he had bitten to death two men and a woman, and had eaten thirteen children, among them his own son. He was consequently executed. Such a girdle in our day is the liquor traffic and the liquor habit. Those who put it on become, some of them, "blind tigers," hiding in dark alleys of Prohibition towns to bite the drunkards who seek them; others, worse tigers, with their eyes wide open, and the collar of State authorization upon them, who go up and down our streets as the devil's own, seeking whom they may devour. The men and women and children they destroy are numbered by the hundred thousand every year. Drinkers turned into tigers by wearing this belt, bite to death their own wives and children. Strange, we haven't sense and courage enough to destroy the deadly belt.

David, in the tenth psalm, fitly pictures this lurking beast that despoils our homes and our cities. "He lieth in wait secretly, as a lion in his den; he lieth in wait to catch the poor." Let us be brave as David in attacking this roaring lion from hell, under the watchword, "In the name of Jesus Christ as King, the liquor traffic must die."

For the Sake of Your Associates, Abstain. Gen. Sherman Bell, a member of the governor's staff in Colorada, was Miss Helen Gould's escort at a brilliant reception at the opening of the St. Louis Fair. The general declined champagne, and the next morning Miss Gould sent him the following note: "I cannot refrain from sending you a few lines to tell you what a comfort it was to me last night that you did not take champagne, for one feels rather odd in refusing, when almost every one takes it. And I am also sincerely glad that this is your usual custom, and was not simply an act of courtesy to a lady."

For the Sake of the Church of God, Abstain. Here is a story that vividly shows where a church member ranks himself who does not abstain. In a town in England, a public discussion took place on the question, "Is total abstinence scriptural?" the conditions being that the audience should not be one packed either by the temperance or liquor people. So an equal number of blue and yellow tickets were printed, with the understanding that only bona fide pledged abstainers were entitled to a blue ticket, all non-abstainers to find place with a yellow ticket. Four hundred of each were printed and placed respectively with a representative of the temperance committee, and a representative of the liquor dealers' association. Many so-called temperance friends were eager for tickets to attend the discussion. "Are you a pledged abstainer?" was asked of one of the officials of a church. "No," was the calm reply; "I suppose I must call myself a moderate drinker, but all the same, I am a great supporter of temperance." "You will have to apply to the liquor man for a ticket." "I shall do nothing of the kind," he said, warmly. "If I cannot be with my own friends—for, of course, with a yellow ticket I should have, I presume, a seat with the brewers and saloon men—I will not come at all."

"Excuse me," said the temperance representative, "but as a just man you would not like to sail under false colors. You—however moderately you drink—support the trade, and the yellow tickets are the tickets of the supporters! As representatives of total abstinence, all who occupy the side of the hall devoted to the blue ticket-holders, must be pledged abstainers!" "Then I will sign the pledge and take my right place," was the prompt reply, and several other church members signed the pledge in time to secure the blue tickets, but it still left several prominent people taking their seats on the eventful night amongst the saloon-men and their friends.

For the Sake of Purer Politics, Abstain. The other day the papers reported that a man called upon Governor Hanly, and urged the claims of a political worker for a position that was about to be filled. The governor listened respectfully to the recital of the applicant's qualifications, and then said: "I should like to appoint your friend, and I have no doubt whatever of the merits of his services to the party, or of his ability to do the work if he did his best. I have noticed that railroads and other large business enterprises of recent years have ruled against men who drink. This is a good policy, I think, and so long as I am Governor of the State, the same policy shall be pursued in its business."

Not alone by making public servants unreliable, but by multiplying crime and poverty and discord, does drink disturb our civic life. In Tonapah, Nevada, two hundred and forty miles southeast of Reno, where wood is scarce, a house was built of ten thousand emptied bottles, which, unfortunately, were not scarce. The house built of bottles is full of suggestion. What ghostly scenes might be seen about it if every empty bottle told the story of its deadly work! What follies and cruelties would come to light! But all over the land there are poorhouses "built of bottles" in another sense. We hear of "bottled goods." Bottled fads would be truer to the awful facts. There are two cups offered us. The one is tendered by the hand of a seeming friend, but it is Lucifer, and as he sees it lifted to the lips, he says, in a voice unheard by the young man:

> "Drink! drink!
> And your soul shall sink
> Down into the dark abyss,
> Into the infinite abyss,
> From which no plummet or rope
> Ever drew up the silver sand of hope."

The other, the cup of blessing, is in the hand of Jesus, who as he gives it to those whom as he has drawn about him by his love, says: "This cup is the new covenant in my blood shed for the remission of sin: drink all ye of it. I will drink it with you in my Father's kingdom."

Abstain for the Sake of the World. This is "World's Temperance Sunday," and it should be especially noted that total abstinence has become a world question. At this time, when proud white men are compelled to learn over again the very thing they thought they knew best—the art of fighting—from the "little brown men" who are sending our weapons to the scrap-heap, and our books of tactics, and especially our military hygiene, to revised editions, it is opportune to remind ourselves that we can also learn from the Orient—this time from ancient India and Arabia—how to fight the greatest foe to civilization.

A THREEFOLD CORD

The Story of a Trio of Twentieth Century Girls

BY AGNES DUNCAN

CHAPTER IV.—ANNE AND PRISCILLA

ANNE HARMON, in a quiet dress of black or Quaker gray, took her place at a desk in the shipping office, and speedily set herself to learn the mysteries of filing, invoicing and footing up long lines of figures. She was rigidly punctual, and as impersonal as the desk at which she sat. The other clerks soon discovered that the young woman had not come to a business office to flirt or expect compliments or waste her employer's time. She gave herself wholly and unaffectedly to the matter in hand, whatever it happened to be.

One day Mr. Guthrie stepped from his private office with an air of annoyance.

"Where's Havens?" he inquired, looking at the men who sat at their desks, heads bent over papers, pens in hand.

"Ill, and at home, Mr. Guthrie," was the answer.

"Pshaw! Is there anyone here who can write a decent, straightforward letter in correct German, to my correspondent in Berlin?"

Nobody spoke for a moment. Then Anne said, modestly:

"If you will tell me the substance of the letter, Mr. Guthrie, I can write it for you. I understand German."

Mr. Guthrie's countenance lighted up.

"Why didn't you say so before?" he inquired, when Anne was seated in his private office, rapidly making notes in German from his English dictation. "Every additional language that a girl or a man knows thoroughly is worth money in business. I had no notion you knew German. What other tongues have you at your command, Anne?"

"French, Spanish, and a little Italian," she answered.

"You don't tell me so. Did John Harmon want you to be a polyglot?"

"Father always encouraged me to study whatever attracted me, and I've never done anything but pore over books. I can't sew, or cook, or play the piano, Mr. Guthrie. I'm only a young woman without accomplishments, who wants to be useful if she can."

"Humph!" said Mr. Guthrie.

The next day she was summoned again into the private office.

"Anne," said the head of the firm, "business or no business, this office is not the best place for you. I've been talking you over with Mrs. Guthrie. She is in great want of a secretary who has a complete acquaintance with French. Janet needs somebody to read German with her. The little ones, Laddie and Lassie, our twins, would be the better of a young lady in the house who would give them a lift with their home work. Mrs. Guthrie authorizes me to offer you the post of secretary and governess, living in our family as one of us, and she will pay you twice as much as we can give here. I can't turn Havens out: the man has a wife and five children. I consider as a business proposition the opening I offer in my home is better than anything in the office. John Harmon would prefer it for you, Anne," he ended, dropping his voice.

"Very well, Mr. Guthrie. You are very kind. I will come."

At home there was a good deal of demur when Anne unfolded her tale. Peggy and Priscilla both felt that she would leave a vacant place that would mean more of a heartache than she knew. But she was going only a mile away, to the Guthries' beautiful home on the bluff, where most of the Edgetown people of wealth resided, and they would see her often. Priscilla had hated the idea of Anne in a dingy office down by the wharves. Anne in the same household with Janet Guthrie impressed her with a sense of the fitness of things.

Anne herself was not so pleased. She had keenly enjoyed the environment, the stir and breezy activity of the office, even though she was only an insignificant cog in the machinery. She liked to see men from many lands and climes, as they passed to and fro on the street, or came into the warehouse on errands of commerce. Rough, sea-faring men, brown and weather-beaten, with shrewd eyes under a thatch of grizzled brown; cordial fellows from the West, with the air of men accustomed to the saddle; trim city men, always in a hurry; foreigners, their accents telling whence they came, were as interesting to her as a pageant. To write a lady's notes of invitation, make out a lady's checks, read French with a society girl, help children with arithmetic, and undertake the duties incidental to a home, did not appeal to Anne. She had studied and planned for a business life, like a man's, and the enforced routine, the regular hours, and the absolute freedom to drop care and relax at the day's end seemed to her a hundred-fold more desirable than the luxury and lack of system she must anticipate at the Guthrie's.

"I ought to have been a boy," she sighed, ruefully. "Girls' work and girls' frocks have never suited me. I hate chiffons. I'd like football."

But she was sensible. This year she meant to fill her purse, and pay her own expenses, and help her father, so that in the future he need have no harassing worry. It seemed that it would devolve on her and Peggy to do this, for though Priscilla had pulled every wire she knew, not a single order for a miniature had she yet received, and the weeks were flying on toward the holidays.

Priscilla had been painting Christmas and menu cards, but in Edgetown the demand for these decorative pictures was very slight. The Woman's Exchange in some bigger city was suggested; but Priscilla's desire was for immediate profit, and she learned that consignees often had to wait, sometimes almost indefinitely for what they gained from their work.

It was very plain to Anne that in Mrs. Guthrie's home she was to find a niche, through what her little mother would call "a providential leading."

So there she went. The home was spacious, elegantly appointed with solid mahogany and antique rugs, and an air of subdued and unobtrusive splendor allied to comfort.

A beautiful room was given to Anne, and she was told that a maid would care for it.

"You are to be treated precisely as Janet is," said Mrs. Guthrie. "Do not spoil the maids by waiting on yourself."

Some of her own little furnishings from home Anne arranged about her new room. A very lovely miniature of her mother occupied a place on her dressing-table. Janet saw it there, and was full of admiration.

"Whose work is it?" she inquired.

"My sister Priscilla's," was Anne's reply.

"Would she paint one of me as a gift for father and mother, a Christmas surprise?" asked Janet eagerly.

"Yes, indeed. I am sure she would love to do so. She has been hoping for a chance to earn some money."

"What would she charge?"

"That I cannot tell. About thirty dollars, I think. Some artists ask fifty, sixty, and a hundred dollars for a miniature, but Priscilla has not so mastered the art that she can get such a price. But she catches the thing that makes a picture look alive. Thirty dollars would not be too much, would it, Miss Guthrie?" she asked.

"Call me Janet and I will call you Anne. We are just two girls together. I can afford thirty for that Christmas gift, I'm sure."

Priscilla was perfectly delighted when she found at last somebody who wanted her to put her talent to account. She painted Janet with loving fidelity, working steadily through the short hours of the wintry days in her room, which was half a studio now that she had it all to herself. When Janet brought two or three of her girl friends to see the artist and watch her skilled hands at her beautiful avocation, and two other orders for Christmas gifts followed the first, Priscilla gave the room a still further aspect of the studio, by screening the alcove where the bed stood with heavy portieres, found in an old trunk in the store-room, and disposing around it a few properties that made it semble a painter's workshop. She had ver been so radiant in her life, so con-ted, and so sure of her powers. Won-rfully bracing is a little success.

The first earnings to an aspiring girl are re than money. They are a hostage t fortune. They are a pledge of power t produce something that has value in the rket.

Arthur Field found Priscilla tired and occupied in his evening calls. She re-ed to let him call every night. "Three ties a week is often enough for us to et," she said, "in these days when we both at work."

"I don't like your working for pay, eetheart," he said; "I wish you were ng it for your pleasure only. When are married I shall not let you paint body's portrait, nor have any money t I don't give you."

"Yet you don't mind when I'm making rker House rolls, and sweeping, and shing laces, and spending my time in t sort of drudgery that I loathe."

"You shouldn't loathe household tasks, dr, nor call them drudgery. They are aven's appointed work for women. But should never consent to your being a ve, and you are slaving over your shes. You cannot deny that."

"'The labor we delight in, physics n,'" quoted Priscilla. "If ever we rry, Arthur, I shall stipulate that I am have entire liberty to do as I choose out my work. If a woman can earn ough to relieve her husband of some iety and pay for extra help in what she s not like, by working at what she does e, why should she be denied the privi-ge?"

They had many discussions on the point, t it became clear after awhile to Arthur ld, that, when Priscilla wedded him, it uld be as his equal and comrade; not as child to be directed and controlled. He l to reconstruct some of his cherished nions and learn that his future wife's ls were not precisely the ideals of his ther. In the process Arthur's views ex-ded, and he became more of a man, as grew gentler and less dominant.

Assertive he would always be, but a e woman likes her husband to be strong positive, and does not resent a touch aggressiveness, provided he does not try ramp her individuality.

I want you to read a little poem I found newspaper to-day," said Priscilla one ning. "It brought the tears to my s."

The poem was long, and very simple and ely in diction. A mother lay dying. r young children were grouped around bed. The mother called the eldest , only fourteen, and told her to keep ll little ones together, to keep them out heir father's way when he came home l with drink, and to do the best she ld for them. Little Mary promised, she cooked and washed and mended, —

The little chubby fingers lost
Their childish softness and grace,
Roughened and chapped and calloused,
And the rosy, childish face
Grew thin and haggard and anxious,
Careworn, tired and old,
As on those slender shoulders
The burdens of life were rolled.

day came when Mary's strength ebbed. , too, lay on a dying bed. She sent for ttle playmate. She told Katie she would er be better; the doctor said so, and that ething troubled her. She had never had time for religion and the higher life.

But you know how it's been here, Katie—
I've had so much to do,
I couldn't mind the children
And go to the preaching too.

And I've been so tired-like at night,
I couldn't think to pray;
And now, when I see the Lord Jesus,
Whatever am I to say?

And Katie, little comforter,
Her help to the problem brought;
And into the heart made wise by love,
The spirit sent this thought:

"I wouldn't say a word, dear,
For sure He understands;
I wouldn't say ever a word at all,
But, Mary, just show Him your hands!"

There were tears in Arthur's eyes when finished reading the verses. A good test of congenial tastes is tried successfully when two persons agree on the merits of what they read.

CHAPTER V.—THE BLACK SHEEP

PEGGY HARMON had said she would try lodgers next. She did, but before she succeeded in finding lodgers to her mind her plans were wofully upset.

She was looking over the linen closet, and putting away the sheets and pillow-slips that came from Norah's hands, white as the driven snow and fragrant as winds and snow could make them—the very poetry of cleanliness—when Cousin Lavina called her in a voice that shook.

Turning, she saw that something had happened by Lavina's tragic face. Her usual wholesome color had paled and her eyes were as big as saucers.

"What is it? Tell me quickly, please. Is Priscilla ill?"

"No, Peggy, no. But Tom Marshall is back, and he's in the parlor, now."

"Tom Marshall?" repeated Peggy, in a puzzled tone. Then her face clouded over and a hot blush overspread it from brow to chin.

"And Tom Marshall's wife and three children are with him," added Lavina, with the emphasis of a Greek chorus. It was like the accumulation of distress, in the Book of Job, when the servants came running in, to relate horror after horror to the affrighted patriarch.

"What is to be done?" asked Peggy, in a tremulous key, sinking her voice, that Priscilla, who was coming downstairs, should not hear.

"I'm sure I don't know," said Miss Pease. "If you give Tom an inch, he'll take an ell. If you offer that family shelter for a day they'll stay all winter. What would your father do?"

"If father were here he would not turn a blood relation from his door," said Priscilla, firmly. "You know that, Peggy, and so do I. Tom is father's first cousin."

Priscilla had heard every word, as people usually do when special pains are taken to keep them in the dark about what is going on. She now concluded:

"I am going down to see the Marshalls, and I shall try to make them comfortable, Peggy Harmon. You be decent, Cousin Lavina; you be charitable. Tom has had a good deal to contend with, and if he needs a helping hand we must give it to him."

"Hoity-toity," exclaimed Miss Pease, much offended. "Priscilla forgets the difference in our ages. I've had my own troubles with Tom Marshall before she was born. But she is right about your father; John would do what he could."

"Yes, he would. It's all any of us can do. After all, Cousin Lavina, we have to take life as it comes, one day at a time, and we haven't to worry over what comes out of space, without our beckoning."

"The space Tom has come out of, I fancy, is a mighty poor place. Next door to the poor-house and across the way from the gaol, like as not," retorted Miss Pease, grimly. "You go down, Peggy," she continued. "I've got to wrestle in prayer and put Satan behind me before I can clasp Tom Marshall's hand again, or so much as speak to that meaching body, Clare Greene, that married him. Poor Tom; he would not have been so bad if Clare had let him alone."

Miss Lavina Pease had not the look of a woman in whose memory there was a romance. Nevertheless, in that dim corner where abide the ghosts of happy youthful mornings and evenings, there was a lingering bitterness, for when they were girl and boy together, she and her Cousin Tom had been sweethearts, had exchanged rings and plighted their troth. Then, she had been a slender, merry-hearted, capable girl, with plenty of pluck and common sense; and he had been a gay, sanguine, optimistic lad, whose geese were all swans, and who saw a bright fortune in every bubble that attracted him. Had he and Lavina married, he would, no doubt, have settled down into a prosperous farmer, but the blue eyes and lissome grace of Clare Greene caught him a mesh that held him fast, and he was false to his first love.

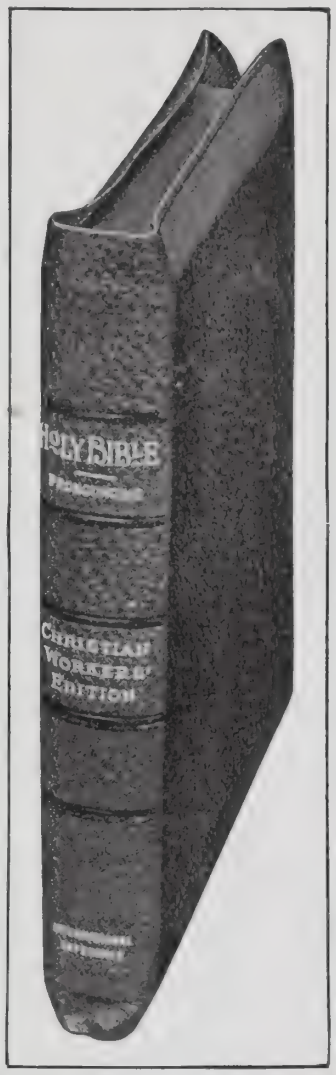
by Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular lecturer and preacher on Bible themes.



By this new plan all the precious truths which lie hidden under a mass of unconnected matters and escape the average Bible reader, are brought to light and tied together by the red thread in one logical entirety.

The Christian Workers' Bible is not for a special class, but for all who read the Scriptures. Equally indispensable for the minister, the Sunday-school teacher, the Y. M. C. A. worker, the busy man or woman; for the weak and halt in Scripture reading.

The Christian Workers' Bible is bound in fine Morocco, Divinity Circuit, with overlapping edges and ends; round corners, gold edges with red undermeath. Size of page, 8½ x 5¾ inches, beautifully printed in large, clear type, on fine dull finish paper.

Dr. Ridpath is dead, his work is done, but his family derive an income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets, would cause great injury to future sales.

The reason for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman Senate; to march against Scanlon and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that little line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt. He combines absorbing interest with supreme scholarship, and makes the heroes of history peak living men and women, and among them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes intensely interesting. 20,000 Americans own and love Ridpath.

Women's Clubs all Against Smoot

SIGNED memorials for the removal of the Mormon Apostle from his seat in the United States Senate, are being received daily from many of the foremost organizations of women. With these lists come letters from secretaries and presidents of the clubs, expressing the heartiest sympathy with the anti-Mormon movement.

Mrs. E. M. Newell, secretary of the Synodical Society of Tennessee, sends a memorial endorsed by the 707 members of the association. Mrs. N. B. Mathes, of Goshen, Ind., sends the endorsement of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Ohio Synod of the Reformed Church of the United States, of which organization she is secretary. The fifteen hundred and sixty-four members of this society, send in the petition with the prayer "that righteousness may soon cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."

Two hundred and eighty-five members of the 20th Century Club of Detroit, Mich., voice their approval of the Anti-Mormon memorial. Among the other clubs which have unanimously given their sanction and a God-speed to the women's movement against polygamy, are these: The Ingleside Club, Marengo, Ia.; The Art Club, Cherokee, Ia.; The Woman's Club, Carbondale, Ill.; Federation of Women's Clubs, Black Hills, S. D.; The Women's Club, Bellefontaine, O.; New Century Club, Hartford, Mich.; Progressive Literature Club, McPherson, Kan.; Nineteenth Century Club, Pilot Point, Tex.; Social Culture Club, Yellow Springs, O.; Salamagundi Club, Newark, N. J.; Irving Club, Irvington, N. J.; Prospect Club, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Ossioli Circle, Knoxville, Tenn.; The Clifton Literary Club, Dorchester, Mass.; Home Study Club, Ashland, Mass.; Monday Club, Johnson City, Tenn.; Century Club, Bloomsburg, Pa.; West End Fortnightly Club, Muscatine, Ia.; Woman's Club, Marion, O.; Helen Hunt Circle, Piqua, O.; Ohio Literary Club, Pana, Ill.; La Mesa Women's Club, La Mesa, Calif.; Wednesday Club, Fresno, Calif.; Nomad Club, Mansfield, O.; M. F. C. Club, Lenox, Ia.; Northboro Woman's Club, Northboro, Mass.; Woman's Club, Carpenteria, Calif.; Woman's Club, Fox Lake, Wis.; Hannah Adams Club, Westfield, Mass.; The Thursday Club, Hico, Tex., The Current Events Club, Santa Paula, Calif.

The W. C. T. U. has responded nobly, and so also have many church societies. The names are rolling in by thousands daily, and a single day's mail sometimes reaches the 8,000 mark. Women are awakening to their responsibility in this matter, which is of such vital importance to them and to their families.

From the far-off village of Beaver Crossing, Neb., of only 300 population, comes a memorial with over 200 signatures. Mrs. L. M. Bezinge, in a letter accompanying the memorial, says: "This petition has been educating many who did not even know there was such a thing as polygamy in the country."

A list of 174 names from St. Louis, Mich., comes with this word: "These names were secured by my mother, nearly eighty years of age. She is unable to walk far, and she secured the signatures by stopping strangers who were passing by on the street. Surely a cause championed by such earnest and self-sacrificing workers as this has called forth, must succeed." Another writes, from California, that through severe illness she has been unable to secure names to the petition. She says, "But my little boy, aged eleven, is a great reader, and he begged me to let him try. There are only a few names, but he firmly believes that by the addition of these few, Smoot, and perhaps Mormonism, will be forever banished."

Mrs. Ella Horlacher, of Montoursville, Pa., writes, "Enclosed please find the last of my Anti-Mormon memorials. During the summer I have sent at different times about 1,200 names. I have gotten these by going to the parks on picnic and excursion days, and by attending numerous conventions and public meetings. This last memorial has traveled many miles over a rural free delivery route. I pray God that he may bless our efforts."

Let Men Aid the Campaign

Editor of "The Christian Herald":—It was with pleasure that I read in the last copy of your excellent paper a communication from a man on the subject of Mormonism. I have read during the past few months the appeals to the women of our land, to work with all their might for the removal of Reed Smoot from the Senate, calling it "a woman's question."

Where are the men of this country who have allowed such a wicked thing to go on so long and to assume such proportions? Have they no interest in the question? Should they not do as your correspondent suggests, and feels he ought to "turn to and aid the women in this campaign for honor and morality"?

At the time of Mr. Smoot's election, some of the correspondents of the press wrote what "a fine man" he was, and that "polygamy was dying out," when the evidence is to the contrary. I do earnestly hope that the men of our country will be led to see their duty and responsibility in doing their part to rid our beloved land of such a hideous thing as Mormonism, and will not permit men to help make laws for the people, who live in violation of law or uphold those who do.

Salem, N. Y. E. H. L.

Notes of the Women's War

There is no denial of the apparently well-authenticated rumor that Smoot has been deposed as the church's political boss. The reasons given for the ousting of Smoot are primarily the odium he has brought upon his church, the annoyance and distress he has caused it, and the selfish arrogance he has displayed throughout in his political manipulations. He dragged the president of the church from his safe seclusion here, and caused him in the Smoot interest to be held up in contempt and derision before the world, a spectacle for gods and men; a pledge-breaker, defier of law, violator of his own church's precepts. Smoot has also revived "the Mormon question" in a worse form than ever before. Why, indeed, should he not resign as Senator, and thus undo, so far as he can undo it at this late stage of the game, the black mischief that he has wrought?—Salt Lake Tribune.

SHIFT

If Your Food Fails to Sustain You, Change.

One sort of diet may make a person despondent, depressed, and blue, and a change to the kind of food the body demands will change the whole thing.

A young woman from Phil. says:

"For several years I kept in a run-down, miserable sort of condition, was depressed and apprehensive of trouble. I lost flesh in a distressing way and seemed in a perpetual sort of dreamy night mare. No one serious disease showed, but the 'all-over' sickness was enough.

"Finally between the doctor and Father I was put on Grape-Nuts and cream as it was decided I must have nourishing food that the body could make use of.

"The wonderful change that came over me was not, like Jonah's gourd, the growth of a single night, and yet it came with a rapidity that astonished me. During the first week I gained several pounds in weight, my spirits improved, and the world began to look brighter and more worth while. And this has continued steadily, till now, after the use of Grape-Nuts for only a few weeks, I am perfectly well, feel splendidly, take a lively interest in everything, and am a changed person in every way." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

From 1611 to 1901

For nearly 300 years the Bible was not re-translated. The language of the 1611 or "King James" edition had all these years remained unchanged, while the English language itself changed so much that at least twenty-five different dictionaries were necessary.

For these reasons

"Proctor Bill"--A Kentucky Feudist

BY REV. EDWARD O. GUERRANT, D.D., Wilmore, Ky.

THOSE of you who are familiar with the history of Jerry McAuley will not be surprised at this story of "Proctor Bill." In many respects they are similar.

A few years ago I had an appointment to preach in a little mountain schoolhouse on the Ivy Patch Creek, in Lee County, Kentucky. On going there I found that Rev. William Little, alias "Proctor Bill," had an appointment for the same time. I had never met him, and knew nothing of his character. He was a typical Highlander, big-boned, erect, resolute in word and deed; with deep-set, piercing eyes which showed a dauntless spirit. I insisted on his preaching, but he modestly but firmly declined, saying he was but an ignorant mountain man and would not preach where others were to do it.

I preached a short sermon and then asked him and Mr. Griffiths, our young mission teacher, to speak a word to the children. To his modest request he yielded a reluctant assent. I shall never forget his manner or his talk to the young people. Both were peculiar and unique. He spoke with tremendous earnestness and energy. He was a Boanerges in action. No one could doubt his sincerity nor his courage; yet his language was simple as a child's. He knew no other, being an unlearned man. It was the speech of the "common people," who heard him gladly. It was largely the language of the Bible.

It was in the summer time, but he had on a suit of winter clothes, and the effort of speaking covered him with perspiration. He removed profoundly moved, and he moved the people as few college men could have done. As to the matter of his discourse, I was not surprised. It was largely Scriptural and entirely evangelical. His quotations were apt and correct, and the wonder grew when I learned how and where he had learned.

I shall never forget his introduction. As near as I can recollect it, he said, "My friends, you know me. I was born and raised in this country. On this very spot where this schoolhouse stands I once sold and drank whiskey. Left an orphan by a bad father, I had no one to teach me to do right. My mother was a godless woman. I never heard her pray in my life. When a boy I tried to kill Rob Hill for striking a smaller boy. As I grew older and larger I grew more wicked and desperate. In drinking, gambling and fighting I was a leader. Just over this hill I tried to kill a man for an insult. I was tried and sent to the penitentiary for three years. I there never learned to read and I never owned a Bible. I neither 'feared God nor regarded man.'

"Proctor Bill"

"In the Penitentiary I was compelled to attend the prison worship on the Sabbath days. A Mr. Morrison preached, and God spoke his words to my heart. I felt I was a lost sinner, and for twelve days I could neither eat nor sleep. I lay in my cell the case of miserable of men, and cried to God for pardon. Blessed be his name, he heard my cry and pardoned my sins and saved my soul. I rose up a new man, and determined to learn to read God's Word. I was then thirty-nine years old, but by hard work I learned to read, and determined to tell others what he had done for my soul. That is why I am here to-day." This is only a bare outline of what he said.

It was a remarkable discourse, and produced a profound impression. Men knew he was honest and earnest, and not afraid to say what he believed. Since the day he left the Penitentiary he has been trying to preach the Gospel in the very county which knew his sin and shame. Men hear him and marvel at the wonderful change. Many have been led to Christ through his ministry.

Having no horse, he walks across the mountains to his Sunday appointments, sometimes fifteen miles. Having no money, he has no books nor clerical clothes. His earthly possessions consist of a wife, four little girls and a boy, on a rented mountain farm. This he works through the week.

To enable him to give more time to this work, and to help him clothe his wife and children, we have, for a few years, been paying him a little salary; a few dollars a month. It is the first he ever received.

Last Saturday he came to Glen Athol and asked me to preach for him at the Middle Fork Church, where he and Mr. Boyd were holding a meeting. I went gladly, and found a multitude of Highlanders assembled, almost all of whom had walked miles over the mountains. He had begun the service half an hour before I, mounted on a half-broken mule, could reach the church.

For an hour and a half the people listened with profound interest.

"Proctor Bill" had gathered them there, and led the singing. At the close, I was impelled to give an invitation to all who would accept Christ as a Saviour, and over twenty-five persons came forward, for the first time. It was a sight to make "joy in the presence of the angels of God." Most of them were young men and women, and no country can show a handsomer company than they were. I was reminded of General Howard's astonishment at the appearance of these Highlanders, when he first came to visit our missions. He said he never saw handsomer young people anywhere in all his wide experience. Exposure and hardship, however, soon make many of them prematurely old.

After the morning service I went home with "Proctor Bill" to dinner. It was my first visit. I had never seen a member of his family except his wife, who confessed Christ at Frozen Creek, when I organized that church. I rode a mile or more up the Kentucky River with a guide, crossed the stream, and found the little cabin of two rooms, situated in a corn field. It stood in a valley between a steep mountain and a deep river. All of his four acres were in corn to feed his family. He had built the cabin himself, of rough boards.

At 3 in the afternoon I preached again to a large congregation, who had walked miles away to dinner, and then returned. It was a typical Highland congregation. Their earnestness and simplicity appealed to our hearts, and it was a privilege and pleasure to preach to them.

FROM TEXAS

Some Coffee Facts From the Lone Star State.

From a beautiful farm down in Texas, where gushing springs unite to form babbling brooks that wind their sparkling way through flowery meads, comes a note of gratitude for delivery from the coffee habit.

"When my baby boy came to me five years ago, I began to drink Postum Food Coffee, having a feeling that it would be better for him and me than the old kind of drug-laden coffee. I was not disappointed in it, for it enabled me, a small delicate woman, to nurse a bouncing healthy baby 14 months.

"I have since continued the use of Postum for I have grown fond of it, and have discovered to my joy that it has entirely relieved me of a bilious habit which used to prostrate me two or three times a year, causing much discomfort to my family and suffering to myself.

"My brother-in-law was relieved of chronic constipation by leaving off the old kind of coffee and using Postum. He has become even more fond of it than he was of the old coffee.

"In fact the entire family, from the latest arrival (a 2-year old who always calls for his 'potie' first thing in the morning), up to the head of the house, think there is no drink so good or so wholesome as Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

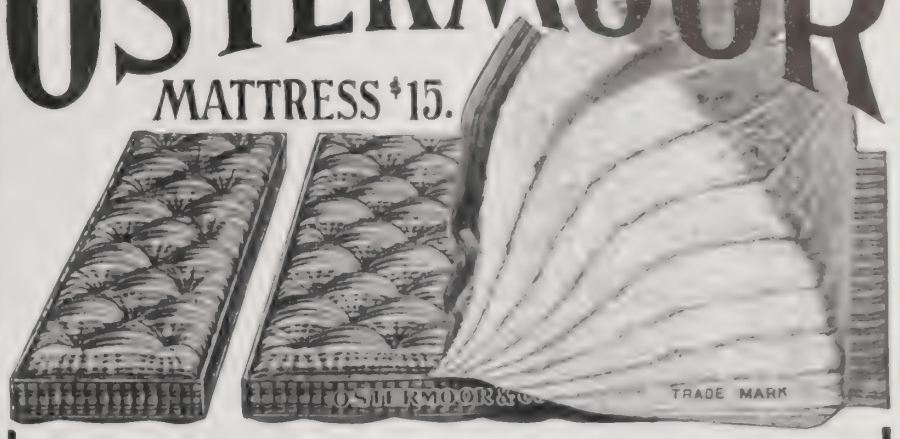
OSTERMOOR

MATTRESS $15.



A Mattress of Proven Worth is the Only Safe One to Buy

Why buy any mattress but an OSTERMOOR, when you can get the genuine OSTERMOOR with no more trouble than you get the distasteful hair mattress, or the worthless imitation "cotton" mattress—made to sell on the strength of OSTERMOOR fame, but no more the rest-giving OSTERMOOR than a cotton plant is a muslin dress. These substitutes have no reputation to live up to, no "family honor" to maintain. The OSTERMOOR is backed by 52 years of sterling merit.

There is no reason why a mattress shouldn't last longer than the bed. The OSTERMOOR lasts a lifetime—is practically un-wear-out-able; can never lose its shape; is built, not stuffed, so never needs "remaking"; is germ-proof and cannot harbor vermin; is kept everlastingly fresh by an occasional sun-bath.

You spend a third of your life in bed. Is it nice to think of spending that third over dead hair and disease germs? And why toss over the hills and valleys of the ordinary, "just-as-good" mattress? Insist upon the genuine OSTERMOOR.

Two Ways to Buy the Ostermoor

Call On One of the 2,000 Ostermoor Dealers

To protect the public from worthless substitutes, exclusive agencies are being established with high-grade merchants in every town and city so far about 2,000 local firms sell the "Ostermoor." Our name and trade-mark label are sewn on the end so that you cannot be deceived.

Send us your name and we will send you our handsome 136-page book, "The Test of Time," and the name of the dealer in your place who sells the genuine Ostermoor. Beware of the 'just-as-goods."

Sleep on it thirty nights, and if it is not even all you have hoped for, if you don't believe it to be the equal of any $50 hair mattress ever made, you can get your money back by return mail. Sight-Seeing in Stockholm.

The shops in Stockholm are excellent. Furs can be bought to advantage. So can Swedish embroidery and the quaint and handsome Dalecarlian costumes. The Swedish national dress, like the Swiss, is hardly to be seen in the towns except among the waitresses at the restaurants.

Stockholm is well off for public gardens, of which the famous Djurgard, or deer park, is the finest. It occupies an island two miles long and nearly three-quarters of a mile wide. It is the Bois de Boulogne of Stockholm. Here we may refresh the inner man at the Hasselbacken restaurant, and visit the charming little Palace of Rosendal and the Skansen Museum. This fascinating collection illustrates the life of the Swedish country people as it has developed from the dawn of history. Lapp camps, reindeer enclosures, charcoal-burners' huts, and collections of hares, foxes, otters, and reindeer in the natural habitats, are a few of the attractions. From the Belvedere tower we see Stockholm beneath us, throned on the waters and surrounded by miles of pine forest.

Books Received

Cæsar, Episodes from the Gallic and the Civil Wars, with an Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary, by Maurice W. Mather, Ph.D., formerly instructor in Latin at Harvard University. Published by the American Book Company, New York, Cincinnati and Chicago.

The Road-Builders, by Samuel Merwin, author of Calumet K. Illustrated; a stirring and realistic modern story, $1.50; and Tales of the Fish Patrol, by Jack London, author of The Call of the Wild. Illustrated. A story of powerful dramatic interest. The Macmillan Company, New York, publishers.

Rational Living. Some Practical Inferences from Modern Psychology, by Henry Churchill King. A book for the student and the thinker, and one which "points out the practical suggestions of modern psychological investigations." Pp. 271, cloth binding. Price $1.25. The Macmillan Company, New York, publishers.

The Long Day. The Story of a New York Working Girl, as told by herself. There is a pathos and a realism about this simply-told experience that must touch every reader. The characters are types of a class common to all large cities. Pp. 303, cloth covers. Price $1.20. The Century Company, New York, publishers.

Northern Trails. Some Studies of Life in the Far North, by Wm. J. Long. Illustrated by Charles Copeland. All lovers of nature will enjoy this new book. The author takes the reader away up in the frozen North, where the trails of the wild animals are patiently followed. Price $1.50. Published by Ginn & Co., Boston, Mass.

Heart's Desire. The Story of a Contented Town, Certain Peculiar Citizens, and Two Fortunate Lovers. By Emerson Hough. A story of the Far West, where Adam was exceedingly happy, but still lonely, without his Eve, in the "Land of Heart's Desire." The characters are very entertaining, especially after the advent of the "Girl from the States." Published by the Macmillan Company, New York.

Also received from the American Book Company, The Rose Primer, by Edna Henry Lee Turpin. Carpenter's Geographical Reader, by Frank G. Carpenter. The purpose of this book is to give a simple knowledge of the peoples and countries of Africa as they are to-day. Finely illustrated. First Year in Algebra, by Frederick H. Somerville. Elementary Physical Science, by John F. Woodhull. Commercial Correspondence, by Albert C. Belding. La Fille de Thuiskore. Tueton Ideals in French Prose, by Kate Thecla Conley.

Short Stories from American History, by Albert F. Blaisdell and Francis K. Ball. This is one of the best books of its kind that has been published in recent years. It was intended by its authors to be used as a supplementary reader for young people who were taking up the study of American history in their school work, but it is well fitted for others who desire to get some knowledge of great historical events in this country, presented in an attractive and readable form. The stories of the "First Thanksgiving," "On the Plymouth Shore," "The Boston Tea Party," and "The American Army of Two," cannot fail to set the blood of young America coursing through his veins, and be a strong influence in educating him to a sense of patriotic citizenship. Ginn & Co., publishers, Boston, New York and Chicago.

Health Culture Readers, Numbers One and Two, by the author of "Preston Papers." A captivating little book, written by one who understands not only her subject, but how to make it interesting to boys and girls. The author's experience as a teacher developed the fact that story-telling was a never-failing medium by which the child's interest might be awakened, and so this book contains a series of stories about "Six Little Headaches: How They Came and Went"; and "Six Little Colds: How They Were Caught and How They Escaped"—all told in a most bright and entertaining way. Following these is "The Bank of Health," which constitutes part second. In simple words the author gives rules for the care of the body, and very good rules they are. In the chapter on care of the eyes, the author remarks, "Don't read fine print very much, as that is especially trying. There is enough mental effort spent in catching the meaning of most authors without adding to it by studying out the letters." Text and type of Health Culture Readers are plain and easily read. Published by Hill & Evans, 153 East Eighteenth Street, New York. Price 50 cents.

God's Wonderful Works*

DURING the past half-century, there has been an attempt on the part of sceptical writers to eliminate God om his universe. It has been represented t Evolution might account for the won- rful works that the Psalmist attributed t God. But a better state of feeling has w arisen. The most able scientists now mit that there must have been a begin- ng, and that Evolution is only a develop- nt. It is, in fact, God's way of working. is a process in which God moves from de material to the conditions that we w see around us. That his word called t elements into being, and has guided l directed every step in the orderly gression, there can be no doubt. Evo- ion itself is not clearly proved. It is rely a hypothesis, but if it is ultimately nonstrated, it will not shake our faith the Almighty and All-wise Creator. e can say with the patriarch: "Lo, these parts of his ways; but how little a por- n is heard of him!" It is with these ngs as it has been with the thunder. ere was a time when the roar of the under was believed to be the voice of d. We understand the cause of it now, as the prophet perceived, if God is in the thunder, nor in the wind, nor in earthquake, he is in the still small ce that speaks to every listening soul. Nor is his presence seen only in the won- s of nature. At this Thanksgiving sea- we are specially minded to remember activity in our national affairs. The rvelous development of this nation is directly his work. Who would have sup- ed that a Power so insignificant as the ited States were a hundred years ago, uld have grown to the status they now oc- y, in the world's esteem? The increase of terial wealth in their crops and manu- tures, is alone prodigious, but far more arkable is the gradual development of ir moral influence in the world. It is longer possible to ignore our Govern- nt in the councils of the nations. In Chinese troubles the voice of our Cabi- was potent in the settlement, and gland would have failed in her protest inst the partition of the nation had not . Hay supported her. Spain, too, learned t her barbarities in Cuba must cease en the United States spoke. In the ent triumph of peace between Russia d Japan, our President bore a conspicu- part. When no European nation dare e a protesting voice, the United States, ong in their disinterestedness could in- vene, and the roar of war was hushed. t unto us, O Lord, not unto us but unto name, be all the glory. God who was h our fathers, who preserved the little mpany of the Mayflower, and enabled exiles to plant deep and true the prin- les of righteousnes on this continent has n with our nation in storm and in pros- ity, slowly but surely developing a at nation for his purposes.

At this season, too, we must remember responsibilities. "Beware," said the phet to his people, as he saw their ure prosperity, "lest when thou hast lt goodly houses and dwelt therein, and en thy herds and thy flocks multiply, l thy silver and thy gold are multiplied, l all that thou hast is multiplied—lest u forget the Lord thy God, not keeping commandments and statutes. And it ll be if thou do forget, as the nations ich the Lord destroyeth, so shall ye ish, if ye are not obedient to the Lord r God." They did forget and their es in every city in our land, with their ngly marked features and their ancient toms, remind us how the warning was cuted. Their fate, wanderers from ir ancient home, a people without a d and without a government, should be perpetual warning to us as a people. d is the same God now as he was when spoke to them beside the Jordan. His thods have not changed. He demands hteousness of the people that he blesses d prospers. Mere offerings do not con- t him. He insists on right character, justice, on integrity, on consideration the poor. He is patient and long suf- ing, but his rule is absolute and in the l his punishment is sure. Let us as a ple, then, be faithful to him, grateful all his mercies and unfaltering in our dience to his commands.

Christian Abnegation

By Mrs. M. Baxter

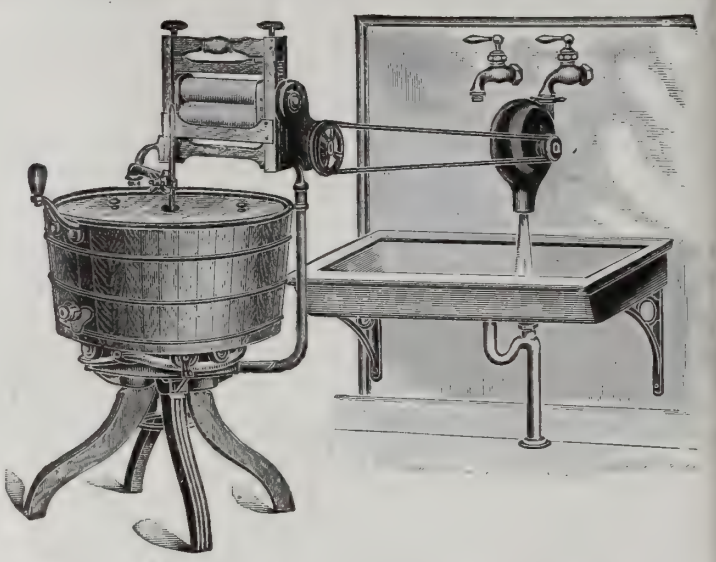
IT is our privilege, as God's children, to be unselfish. The first and great commandment is not, "Thou shalt serve," but "Thou shalt love." How wonderful that our mighty God should care for our love. But he does, and asks not a little. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind;" this is the first and great commandment. Love settles many questions, and the question of stimulants among them. A man may leave off the use of stimulants from the cool, quiet persuasion that they are harmful for himself. The motive is not wrong, but it is not the highest. The mighty wave of abstinence from stimulants in South Wales of late did not arise from such a motive. Thousands of men and women and children had come into personal touch with God, who is love; they had understood, their hearts were taken captive with his love in Christ, which "passeth knowledge," and they thirsted to please him.

An instinct, born of love to God, sprang up within them to abandon the drink. They knew that under its influence they had ceased to pray, and they could not praise their God. They knew that the foul language which had degraded their life came from the excitement and madness caused by the drink; they knew that blasphemy, swearing, and cursing, were the accompaniments of their indulgence of the drink; and now the love of God had come in, and they shrank with horror from the chains which had bound them, and which, by the power of the blood of Christ, shed for them, had burst asunder. Their new instinct told them that the drink had brought them under the power of the devil; they loved their new Master, and for his sake, as well as their own, they fled from their old enemy.

And these men and women have new tastes: "old things have passed away; all things are become new" (II. Cor. 5 : 17). The old ruling passion to please and to indulge themselves has given way to a deep longing to please Him who has become the centre of their life, and if the old temptation returns, it is not met by the conflict of a will in the balance between God and Satan, but by a will wholly surrendered to him who has died for them. Some might say to them, "It wouldn't do you any harm now to drink a glass of beer." But the "no harm" standard has become past history to them, and "For God's sake, and for my fellow-men's sake, I will not touch it," is the instinctive answer. Love has settled it.

But besides the present drunkards, there are a large number to whom intoxicants have never been a snare, who take them occasionally, but have never been consciously overcome by them. "Why should I," such an one asks, "abstain from that which I like, and which is no snare to me?" There are members of churches, deacons, class leaders, church wardens, ministers, clergymen, and bishops, who ask this question. There are public benefactors who do the same. And these all have influence. Every one of such indulging in intoxicants is one who helps by his example the incipient drunkard to become the confirmed drunkard, and the confirmed drunkard to become the pauper.

Why should I abstain? Look only once at him who with wounds in his hands, and feet, and side, pleads his poured-out life-blood as the justification of God's pardon to sinners. Look at him; and think if he had said, "Why should I abstain from my high glory in heaven, and come down to the humiliation of taking the nature of that fallen race upon me? Why should I submit to such indignity and insult?" Why? Because God is love. There can be no other answer. O, child of that God of love, why should you deny yourself? To prove your parentage. "Be ye imitators of God, as beloved children."



This Self-Working Washer Cuts Out Your Laundry Bills

TAKE a good square look at that new "Self-Working Washer" of mine, in the picture above.

You see how it works,—just by running water,—and not a great deal of that needed either.

I can tell you how to work that Washer without running water, too.

But, I'm not going to use a lot of words to explain my Self-Working Washer to you here.

Because I have a better way of explaining it.

I'll just ship it (without coaxing or lawyers' work) to any responsible person in the United States or Canada, so they can see, and prove how it works, for themselves.

And I'll pay the freight on it, both ways, myself, too.

I'll do that to show you I have no foxy "graft" up my sleeve, to make you keep the machine whether you want it or not.

You just take it home from the station,—that's all.

And then you'll see what it will do for you.

Start it up for the next Wash-Day, and let it wash all the dirty clothes in the house in a couple of hours. (A baby could start it.)

And you needn't care how big a washing you have, either.

Because, this "Self-Worker" will do all the Washing, and all the Wringing, without any labor of yours, or of any other human being.

* * *

You just throw the dirty clothes into the tub-full of soapy water. Then you turn on a tap, sit in a chair, and see that old Washer of mine do the work without any Wear or Tear on the finest clothes.

Now, I know this sounds too good to be true.

But my offer proves it must be true.

Because, you see,—I couldn't make anything out of that offer if the Machine wouldn't do just what I say it will, on the month's trial.

You'd send it back to me mighty quick, and I'd have to pay all th freight and cartage both ways, as well as all the packing, unpackin and breakage.

That would cost me a pretty penny on the million dollars worth Washers I send out yearly.

So you've got to believe my Self-Working Washer will do what say, until you prove it won't do it, as I'll give you a chance to do.

And, I say our Self-Working Washer will wash the dirtiest clothe as clean as the best Washer-woman could do it, in half the time, an then wring them out, without any work on your part.

Mind you, it's really a Self-Working Washer that I want to sen

Not a machine that will do "nearly all the work"—as the parrot say—but will do all your washing and wringing itself, without an help from you.

I don't want a cent from you, nor a note, nor a promise, till you'v proved what I say is true, in a full month's trial at my expense.

Then you may keep the Self-Working Washer, and pay me 60 cent a week for it, out of what it saves you,—if you want to keep it.

Or, you may use it a month free, and send it back to your neares Railroad Station if you don't want it, with my name on it, without cent of risk or expense on your part.

How is that for an offer?

Could anything be fairer?

Well, I want to hear from you at once about it. Because this offe is going to keep our factory pretty busy, and lots of people won't ge their names in until it's too late for the trial offer.

My name is R. F. Bieber, and I am the Treasurer of The "19 Washer Co." Our Office is at 5117 Henry St., Binghamton, N. Y Write me there, or 355 Yonge St., Toronto, Ont., about the Washe that works itself. Say,—do it now while you think of it!

I Am the Paint Man

Let Me Give You 2 Gallons of My Paint As a Test

SUPPOSE you went to a store and the man placed 2 full gallons of paint on the counter and said "Here is some paint I want you to try before you buy. Just spread these 2 gallons on your walls. When you have done so, if the paint is entirely satisfactory, come in and buy the balance of your order. If not, these 2 gallons are a present from me as a test."

You would think it was a mighty fair offer, wouldn't you?

But no paint dealer ever makes this kind of an offer. * * *

I am not keeping a paint store.

I am running a paint factory.

My paint is not sold over the counter.

I sell it direct from my factory to the user fresh.

Let me make you a better and more liberal offer than the above.

Here it is.

Let me ship you an order of paint. I will pay all freight on 6 gallons or more.

You sign no contract, obligation, or send me a penny of money in advance.

When the paint arrives choose any 2 full gallons of the order, spread it on your building—it will cover 600 square feet, 2 coats—then you be the judge as to whether you want to use the balance of the order or not.

If not, return the balance of the paint—I will pay the freight back and the 2 gallons used are yours, free, for the test.

If the paint spreads better—further—and looks better than any paint you ever saw, and you want to use the balance of the order, keep it and pay me at the end of 6 months.

With the paint I send my pen-and-ink signed iron-clad Guarantee that it will last 8 years.

This Guarantee is binding and says "money back at the end of the Guarantee period if the paint is not as represented."

The reason I can make you this liberal offer is because I manufacture and sell paint in a new way.

My pigment, or paint base,—which is white lead, zinc, coloring matter and drier—is ground fresh to order after your order is received, hermetically sealed in cans, dated the day it is packed, and shipped in separate cans from the oil.

My Pure Old Process Linseed Oil is shipped in a twin can.

My paint is ready to use but NOT ready mixed.

There are reasons for my manufacturing and selling this way. Good reason-.

Reasons that permit me to give an 8 Year Guarantee.

Briefly, here they are:

Paint pigment is a mineral,

Pure linseed oil is a vegetable.

When packed together the chemical action of the mineral pigment eats the life out of the oil—that shortens the life of the paint.

Old process linseed oil is scarce on the market.

Oil used in ready mixed paint is usually adulterated.

My oil is pure.

Shipping it separately gives you a chance to prove it.

Ready mixed paint settles—a cement-like substance forms in the bottom of every can. This can never be properly mixed again by hand.

My method of shipping pigment and oil separately, does away with all settling. You can use every drop out of every gallon of my paint on your walls, and you get the full life of the paint on your buildings.

I want to tell you more about my plan.

Just drop me a line today, asking for my Paint Book, copy of my Guarantee, and other printed matter, which includes my feee instructions "This Little Book Tells How to Paint." They are all FREE.

Do it now while you think of it.

The Paint Man,

The Better Way

GOD would never send you the darkness
If he thought you could bear the light,
But you would not cling to his guiding hand
If the way was always bright,
And you would not walk by faith,
Could you always walk by sight.

'Tis true He has many an anguish
For your sorrowing heart to bear,
And many a cruel thorn crown
For your tired head to wear,
He knows how few would reach heaven at all,
If pain did not guide them there.

So He sends you the blinding darkness,
And the furnace of sevenfold heat,
'Tis the only way, believe me,
To keep you close to his feet,
For 'tis always so easy to wander,
When our lives are glad and sweet.

Then nestle your hand in your Father's,
And sing if you can as you go,
Your song may cheer some one behind you
Whose courage is sinking low,
And well if your lips do quiver,
God will love you better so.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

J. W. V., Alain, Tex. What does Isaiah mean by saying (45: 7) that God creates evil? If God creates it how can man be responsible?

It is the peculiarity of Hebrew writing to delight in contrasts. You find a long series of them in Proverbs. They are always of the same nature of parallelisms. Thus, in the passage you quote the prophet used the converse of the peace he has been talking of. We should say war. He uses the word evil in the sense of punishment or misery. It is the state of the nation that he is considering. It serves God and is faithful to him and is prosperous. The prosperity comes from God. It deserts him and disobeys him and is punished by captivity and oppression. They also come from God. In that sense he creates the condition which they regard as an evil. There is a similar argument in Romans 11: 22. Moral evil he never creates.

E. P. R., Pearl, Neb. 1. What did the Russians do to show their sympathy with us during our Civil War? 2. What can the women do to unseat Smoot? I am anxious to do all I can.

1. At a time when European intervention seemed probable, a Russian fleet, friendly to the Federal Government, appeared off our coast. 2. Their memorial will be presented to the Senate when it meets. The best way in which the men can help the movement is for each to write to the United States Senators from his own State, urging them to vote for favorable action on the Memorial.

J. O. A., Newark, Ill. What is the origin of the rite of confirmation? Is there any Scriptural authority for it?

The Apostle Paul is represented as confirming the souls of the disciples (Acts 14: 22), and again as confirming the churches (Acts 15: 41), Judas and Silas did the same thing (Acts 15: 32). It does not in these cases appear to have been a rite or ceremony. But there appears to have been some rite of the kind in the early church. The writer of Hebrews speaks (6: 2) of "the doctrine of baptisms and of laying on of hands." He may have had reference to the laying on of hands, implying the gift of the Holy Spirit, as in Acts 8: 17, and as Paul did (Acts 19: 6). It seems to have been a Jewish idea of ancient date, as Jacob thus blessed Joseph's children (Gen. 48: 14). The custom continued in Christ's time (see Matt. 19: 13), when "there were brought unto him little children that he should put his hands on them, and pray."

G. W. N., Clifton, Mass. Who wrote the lines:

"Do not cheat thy heart, and tell her
'Grief will pass away';"

Can you give me the remainder of the stanza?

Adelaide Proctor was the author, the complete verse reads:

"Do not cheat thy heart, and tell her
'Grief will pass away:'
Hope for fairer times in future,
'And forget to-day.'
Tell her, if you will, that sorrow
Need not come in vain.
Tell her that the lesson taught her,
Far outweighs the pain."

J. F. West, Berkeley, Calif. 1. What is meant by the phrase that is so often used by preachers, "Come to Jesus"? Physically it is impossible, and spiritually is he not everywhere? 2. Are we to look for the signs that are to follow them that believe according to Mark 17:18 in these days?

1. It is addressed to men who are in need of the blessings Jesus is prepared to give and who know their need. If they want salvation, rest, peace, a change of heart, etc., they can obtain them by going to Jesus. The way to go to him, the preachers explain. It is to go to him in prayer. As you say, he is everywhere, but he is separated from the unbeliever by the unbelief and can do nothing for him until the suppliant puts his trust in him. When the sinner gives up his resistance and places his case in Christ's hands, submitting to him and accepting his rule, he comes to him and receives the blessings promised. 2. Wonder-working had its mission in the days that the promise was given. Christ himself used it, but he always tried to make it a stepping-stone to spiritual blessing. He did not work miracles to astonish or amuse the people, but to win their confidence and inspire them with faith in his divine mission. The power was confided to his apostles, but was sparingly used. Gradually men learned that it was in the spiritual world that the promise was fulfilled. The greatest miracle of all is a change of character, and that is being performed all around us.

C. M. G., Vancouver, Wash. What studies should a person take with civil engineering? Is there much demand for civil engineers?

1. The first requirement is a thorough knowledge of rudimentary mathematics: arithmetic, algebra and geometry; then the course of study should include physics, higher algebra, trigonometry, analytical geometry and calculus, besides mechanical drawing and strength of materials accompanied by laboratory work, and, when possible, field practice. 2. The degree of civil engineer can only be granted by a duly authorized college or university, on passing the required examination, after two or more years of resident tuition.—Editor The American Inventor, N. Y.

Mrs. C. A. A., Monarda. In the story of the Inquisition you will find instances of Bible burning and martyrdom. In the days of the early Christians many were burned, crucified and otherwise put to death by order of the Roman Emperors. In comparatively recent years, the Bible has been burned in Catholic countries in South America.

J. F., Reaville, N. J., writes:

In a late number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "Reader," Ticonderoga, N. Y., tells of seeing a Bible in a hotel bedroom years ago, but not since, and it may be that they are not usually found there. In 1898 (I think) the Bible Society of this county (Hunterdon) made arrangements to have a Bible placed in each bedroom of every hotel in the county that would accept. That some did accept is in evidence, for a few weeks ago I had occasion to stay overnight at one, and on retiring I found a Bible on the stand in my room, impressed on the side in gilt letters, "Presented by the Hunterdon County Bible Society." A few days afterward, at the annual meeting of the Bible Society, the secretary said that he had seen some of the Bibles thus presented in private houses in the village where he was pastor.

J. L. M., Pasadena, Cal. 1. Were the ten commandments part of the law that was nailed to the cross with Christ? If so, why are they still taught? 2. What authority is there for observing the first day of the week as the Sabbath? 3. What is the mark of the beast mentioned in Revelation?

1. Christ did not come to abolish the law but to fulfil it. Do you suppose he came to set men free from obeying such commandments as those of the Decalogue? If you do, you must have strangely misconstrued his mission. Read Matthew 5: 20-28, and you will see that it was a higher morality, a more radical obedience that Christ demanded. Obedience was carried beyond overt acts into the region of thought and desire. The Decalogue is still taught, because it is a code of morals that no people can disobey without peril. 2. We have answered this question repeatedly. We observe Sunday, not as the Sabbath, but as the Lord's day, commemorating his resurrection, and so consecrating a seventh portion of our time to God and his service, as the spirit of the commandment enjoined. 3. It is a sign of allegiance which the followers of anti-Christ will bear, entitling them to buy and sell under his rule. Numbers were used as letters, and it is supposed that the number 666 is the sum of the value of the letters in his name. Ludovicus, for example, contains it: L, 50; U, 5; D, 500; V, 5; I, 1; C, 100; U, 5; total, 666.

W. W. D., Norristown, Pa. What was the cost to our government of delivering Cuba from Spain and establishing a Cuban government? Also, how much of this expense has Cuba paid back to the United States?

The exact amount cannot be accurately stated. Before the war actually began Congress voted $50,000,000 to be used by the President for putting the country on a war footing. Home Missionary Work for All

THIS is the season when intelligent people generally give serious consideration to the selection of suitable publications for the family reading table during the coming year. It is not an easy task to wisely discriminate, in view of the pretentious claims set forth by nearly every publisher in behalf of his own publication. Errors of judgment in this selection, though entirely unintentional, are often likely to entail serious consequences. Many a wayward trend in life was first suggested by the perusal of an article in some unsafe periodical.

You know The Christian Herald. You know what it stands for. You have read it week after week. You have profited by its interesting and edifying contents. You have enjoyed its pictorial attractions, and many a time have laid it down with the expression: "I Love The Christian Herald!"

Why not have others share your pleasure? Why not do your friends and neighbors a good turn by advising them to try it for the coming year?

Tell them what you think of it; how much good your family and you personally have derived from its perusal, and that if they will give it a trial and do not feel entirely satisfied, we will terminate their subscription and refund to them their money. Perhaps you may thereby induce them to join the ranks of the great Christian Herald Family and help along the dissemination of good literature. Will you not thus aid us in securing a foothold in homes not now on our list? If yes—then please do it now—for now is the time.

With the Prince on his Flagship

Louis of Battenberg Grants his "Maiden Interview" to The Christian Herald

If all men were Prince-Admirals, what a flowery path for the interviewer! It would be a summer day at work a joy.

His Serene Highness, Prince Louis of Battenberg, is the only man I have had the courage to interview just after breakfast. It is a good hour to get at a man's limitations, or to test his quickness of repartee. He is not then influenced by the sparkle of lights or the friction of hands; in other words, he is himself. When this Sailor-Prince for three hours stuck to his guns through my rapid fire of interrogation, I knew him for one who has "the grace that is born and a gallantry that is unstrained."

The fleets loomed dark against the morning sky, and the Admiral's launch, which bore me to the flagship Drake, met the wind and the sea in a sharp embrace. It was cold and dreary and gloomy, but dromedaries could not drag me from my purpose.

I carried in my hand a letter which read: "This is the Admiral's maiden interview, so don't be too hard on him." The form of that admonition distressed me Prince Louis had only just arrived, and was besieged with official visits, but his door flew open at a word, and I was presented in his quarters by a bow. He came forward gracefully, extended a large, cheering hand in greeting, and led me to a cushioned chair by the open fire.

He is an interesting personality, aside from his fame and achievement, and I observed him as he read an important message. He has a frame of great native vigor, and developed, I judged, by systematic athletics. He is very tall, very erect, and very military in his bearing, and typifies the dignity of the service. His nose is long and straight, and his eyes are discerningly brown. He is cautious until satisfied that you are serious; then he gives himself up reservedly to your conference. He is affable and dignified, and has a high-featured face that startles one at a little distance with its resemblance to King Edward, which resemblance, however, a closer observation dissipates.

The Prince is fifty-one years old. He has enjoyed all the advantages that a high, ready-made position could give him. He was educated partly in Germany. He married Princess Victoria of Hesse, the favorite granddaughter of the late Queen Victoria. He has traveled far and wide, both in an elegant, quiet way, and in the restricted manner of the service. He is a man of innate refinement, but has a hearty disregard for mere conventionalities. He talks fluently and easily, and he thinks like lightning.

"Your Highness," I began, with embarrassing seriousness, "can you give me some of your impressions of America for CHRISTIAN HERALD readers?"

He answered readily and easily; but the charm of the talk cannot be transferred to cold, white paper.

Stereograph, Copyright by Underwood & Underwood

The Admiral-Prince on His Flagship, "Drake"

"My impression of America," he repeated, "is one of wonder at her colossal strides in everything that stands for progress. Why, I was here as a midshipman thirty-three years ago, and the changes that have been made since then seem almost incredible. Your institutions, your ingenuity and unlimited resources, your energy and overwhelming hospitality, can give but one impression—and that is of amazement."

He paused a moment, pushed his hair back with a white, elegant hand, and continued with fluency: "I want to emphasize the fact that I am primarily the Admiral and that my name is of secondary importance. I don't want the people to be talking about 'the Prince,' and I accept gratefully all of the mass of hospitality which has been showered upon me as a compliment to the British Navy as a whole, which I have the honor to represent upon this visit. I am infinitely more proud of being in command of a squadron and flying my flag, than of the minor distinction of bearing a handle to my name. My title has more often been a handicap than an assistance. I have had to prove, step by step, my fitness for the service, under rigid conditions. I value more than anything else, the trust of my superiors and inferiors."

He looked up, smiled consciously, hesitated a moment, and then went on:

"There is no happiness equal to that of honest achievement. I have filled creditably several interesting commissions in the course of my experience, but my heart is here," he said proudly, with a sweep of his hand.

It is impossible to transcribe his easy flow of rhetoric, the voice, the manner, the inimitable glance of approval and warning from the eye. All these characteristics serve to make conversation a delight and transcription inadequate.

"Excuse me," said the Prince, as a staff officer came in. "What is it, Captain?"

"Some visitors, sir."

"But I cannot see them now, you know; I am busy."

I am exultantly triumphant at this, and ask him to tell me of the "course indicator" which he has invented.

"I don't know whether I can explain that to you," he answered, quickly. "It would be difficult to describe, even to one in the service, to explain theoretically; but I shall try. You see, when a commander directs the position of ships in his fleet, it is easy enough for them to hold this position when the ships are at anchor; but when going at full speed, as the different vessels have varying speed capacity, it is impossible to keep in line without some contrivance which would adjust the course and speed. After many years of work on trial models (the first one was

The Minister's Best Friend

TEXT: ROMANS 16:9:
"Salute Urbane, our helper in Christ, and Stachys my beloved"

HAVE you ever wandered over any of the great battlefields of the world? Have you ever had a guide lead you over the blood-soaked soil of Gettysburg? Then you have been struck with the fact that no one squad, no one company, no one regiment, no one brigade, no one division alone fought that battle. The success of General George G. Meade, or of Robert E. Lee, depended not more upon their generals being faithful, than upon all the colonels, and majors, and captains, and sergeants, and corporals, and private soldiers being faithful, and working together and in unison. The difference between a conquering army and a mob is the difference between men working together in an intelligent way to achieve a desired purpose, and a conglomerate collection of individuals, each claiming that his own will is the equal, if not the superior of all the other wills and intelligences about him.

What is true of the army is absolutely true in reference to business. How is the Panama Canal to be dug? By the United States Commissioners appointed by the President? By the chief engineer? By the contractors? Oh, no. As in the mercantile establishment, the buyers, the advertising agents, the floorwalkers, the salesmen, the delivery wagons, all work together in unison, and each as a co-operative agent helps the other, so in the Panama Canal all the different departments are working together. Each man is helped by some other man, and each man tries to help the other men. Now what is true in the army and in the business, and in the contractor's world, is equally true in regard to church work. Here we do not find the minister himself doing all the work. Paul himself could not do it. He had his helpers, his associates, his workers. He himself tells us that Urbane and Stachys were his associates in God's work. Neither can the church members make a successful church unless there is co-operation in the pulpit. Thus the purpose of my sermon to-day is to show you who are the minister's best friends; who are the men and the women upon whom he should most wisely lean, and whose advice he should be most anxious to follow. I speak thus, not only to help the pew, but also to answer letters which have come to me from all parts of the country, written by young ministers, asking what course they should take in reference to their church work.

Venerable Helpers

Who are the minister's best friends? In the first place, they are the old folks. They are the men and the women who have been walking with Jesus Christ, twenty, forty, fifty or even sixty years. They are the church members whose hair is white, whose step is often infirm, and whose hearing sometimes must have the sounding-board of the palm of the hand back of the ear, in order to hear the sermons aright. But though their eyes may be weak and their hearing muffled, with those eyes they have been reading the promises of God, and with those ears they have been listening to his words of comfort through many dark trials, which have come to them year in and year out, perhaps for half a century. Now, my friends, the minister of the church of the Lord Jesus Christ cannot afford to turn his back upon such counselors, neither can the church members themselves afford to stop their ears to the words of advice which these aged Christians can speak out of their past experiences.

Is not the man of experience in the temporal world to be more followed than the young stripling whose knowledge consists only of theories and generalities? Suppose you had a very serious illness—suppose a dangerous operation had to be performed upon you, for whom would you send! Would you call the young doctor, who last year graduated at the head of his medical class, brilliant though he might be? No. You would send for such a man as Dr. Hamilton, who stood by the bedside of James A. Garfield, or for a man like Dr. Janeway, who came as fast as revolving wheels could carry him to the bedside of William McKinley, or for a skilful practitioner like Sir Morell MacKenzie, who looked into the diseased throat of Crown Prince Frederick. These were all old men. For years and years and years, they had been examining throats and cutting away diseased tissues. Suppose you were going to ascend the Ganges, the most dangerous navigable river of the world. Every day the current of that river changes. The banks are strewn with the bleaching bones of ships which were allowed to rot in the sun when their keels were beached. Would you send for the brilliant-laced staff officer of India's Viceroy? Nay. You would send for the old, grizzled, white-haired pilot, who for years and years has been running up and down that dangerous stream. He knows by experience where the currents run and where are the dangerous sandbars. He may be cranky. He may be gruff and fault-finding; but he is imperious and peremptory because he knows the dangers, and knows how many lives and valuable cargoes have been lost in that winding stream. Now, my friends, whose advice should the minister most willingly follow? The young men who know but little about Christ, and who have only been church members for a few months? The younger men who have not risen to the high plane where they can drop their selfish ambitions? Or the old men who know that their lives are nearly run, and whose only object is to serve their church during the few years that are left? I want to tell all ministers and all church members, that any minister or any church which gets out of the habit of honoring and following the advice of the old folks, is heading towards almost certain shipwreck. The older members of the church intuitively know when any proposed course is right, and they intuitively know when it is wrong. Better, rather, heed the advice of the old Christians, than any other class of laymen.

Wise Counsellors

"But," says some young minister, or Christian Endeavorer, "the difficulty with the old folks, is, that they are out of sympathy with the young folks. What are we to do when they do not sympathize with us?" My young friend, you are mistaken. The old church members are not out of sympathy with the young folks, when they are acting wisely; it is only when they are rash and imprudent. Furthermore, of all admirers and helpers which the young minister has in his congregation, no class is more loyal to him than the white-haired elders and their wives. As a rule, when men and women grow old, they do not want to go to old people's homes and associate with old people, but they want to associate with the young. Especially do they love to have a young man for their pastor. When my father, a very young man, was called to Syracuse, New York, the most prominent man in that part of the State was a member of his congregation. He was at that time over eighty years of age. In legislative halls he had sat the contemporary and the compeer of Clay, and Webster, and he, himself, was one of the giants of the bar. My father was, at that time, undeveloped and immature. Yet, every Sunday, this big-brained, silver-tongued orator sat at his feet, as William E. Gladstone sat at the feet of his own son in the little church of Hawarden. One day a friend came to him and said, "Well, Senator, how do you like the young preacher?" With that the old man answered: "I am a very old man. I have seen and heard much. But I believe the young man is truly trying to serve his Master. Therefore I shall do all I can to help him. Besides, my friends, the older a man grows, the more he likes young men, and young men's preaching!" Oh, ye young men in the Gospel pulpit, hear it! The best friends a young minister has are the old folks. Beware when the voices of the aged are not heeded in your church councils. When a young minister gets out of touch with the older members of his congregation, he is always out of touch with the best interests of his church, and out of touch with the real teachings of Jesus Christ.

Strengthened by Prayer

But the next class of a minister's best friends to which I wish to call your attention, are the prayer-meeting people. I allude to those who, week in and week out, month in and month out, year in and year out, every Wednesday night as far as they are able, always wend their way to the week-night service as regularly and as conscientiously as they go to the breakfast table in the morning and come home after their business at night. These prayer-meeting folks do not always belong to the wealthy classes. Their wardrobes are not always filled with silks and broadcloths. Some of them during the day may have had on the overalls of a carpenter, or a mason, or they may have held in their hands the order book of a grocery c... ut there is yet another criterion, by which you can ge a minister's best friends. They are to be num-ed among those who do not love their church so uch that they are blinded to the Gospel duties which ar calling them outside of the four walls of that church.
Thy are the Christians who realize that, as there is one mily living within the four walls of the home, so there s church family living within the four walls of the hich. They strive to fulfil their obligations not only o their own family and the church family, but to those outside who do not yet know Christ. The church family s very important family, but it does not represent the whle human race. Now, as every father and mother mu help care for the wants of their indigent neighbo, so every church family should and must care for the spiritual wants of the great heathen outside world.
Therefore, the church member who simply says, "Let us are for our own church, for our own pulpit and pew an Sunday School," is not a true Christian. The true ch ch member is the one who has the missionary pit, and who realizes his duty to China, and Africa, an Persia, and India, as well as to his own city and ne hborhood.

is only by our spiritual scattering that we can a er in, and it is only by our laying down our lives th we can save them. An old Eastern parable goes thu: A merchant was about to go into a far country.
He gave to two friends a couple of sacks of wheat apiece. He said: "Take care of these for me until I return." Years passed, and the merchant returned. He said to his friends, "Where is my wheat?" The first returned to him his two bags of wheat, which he had kept for the merchant in a store-house. The grain was mildewed and useless. The second friend took the merchant out upon the hillside, and showed him his fields below in the valley waving with golden-headed wheat, ready for the sickle. "There is your wheat. I have grown it all for you. It is all yours." Then said the Master: "Give me my two sacks of grain back, and the rest shall be yours." So it is in the missionary work of the church. When our church leaders help us to scatter the Gospel seed upon the other side of the sea, they have faith that God will give us a tenfold, a hundredfold blessing.

But lastly, I remark that the minister's best friends are to be found among those who are ready and willing to work in inconspicuous places. These best friends are not the men who want to push their way into the highest places of the synagogue. They are the men and the women who are ready to take the humble places, the insignificant places, the places which, as a rule, but few people want to fill. And because these men and women are willing to take humble positions, how great a temptation it is for the minister to give the highest positions to those who will not work in the church unless they get these high positions. I have never found a true loyal friend to a minister, unless that friend was as willing to work in an inconspicuous as in a conspicuous place.

I have preached this sermon for two reasons. I want you to know the noble men and the noble women who, like those mentioned by Paul, have labored with so many ministers in the Gospel. As Paul writes in the words of my text, "Salute Urbane, our helper in Christ, and Stachys my beloved. Salute Appeles in Christ." I want you to salute, to-day, some of the excellent men and women who have done so much to upbuild the pulpit's work. Salute these older men and women of our church. How faithful they have been. Then salute these praying men and women. How could we have got along without them? Salute these friends who have always been so true to the pastors that are gone. Then salute those who have been working for our Foreign and Home Missionary causes. Salute them all for Christ's sake.

Then, I had another hope in preaching this sermon. It was that if in the past any of us has fallen below the ideal I have sketched, if the pastor has in any respect failed in his duty, if there is any one who has failed to live near to Christ and so has not been among the minister's best friends, there may be repentance and new consecration. As for me, I promise here and now to surrender myself to his will. Are you ready to make the same avowal? I salute thee, Urbane.

made of wood), I have at last brought it to such a state of usefulness that the Admiralty have found it practicable to apply these instruments to all ships. It is an intricate thing of brass and wood and rather difficult to describe."

"What is the general impression among your people of the Hague Conference and its programme?" I next asked, after a pause, "Is it too ideal?"

The Admiral-Prince raised his head, and looked at me with deep, serious eyes.

The Hague tribunal," he said slowly, "I think, has already justified its existence, while it does not put an end to all big wars. No sensible person ever expected it to do so; but it humanizes warfare, and provides for arbitration whenever it is practicable."

He added that war might at times be a necessity, and expressed his belief in the French proverb, "You can't make an omelette without breaking the eggs." Evils must be sacrificed for noble causes or to achieve some great purpose. War, therefore, he regarded as a natural necessity.

But what a fine thing, your Highness," I ventured, "a peace coalition of great Powers would be—wouldn't it?"

He stared doubtfully at me, and shook his head.

Personally, I am not in favor of it; but I am not giving my individual views. I think it would be preferable for one to stand on one's own legs. However, it is very encouraging to know that one has friends standing around, who will prevent others from chiming in when one is a bit pumped. That would be true friendship!"

Alliances, he said, did not always operate harmoniously in time of war, and he cited Trafalgar as an example of this condition. The allied French and Spanish navies exceeded the British, but the direction and discipline of that alliance was inharmonious.

The same conditions would not obtain in the case of an Anglo-American alliance," he continued, "because we speak the same language, and employ presumably the same underlying directing ideas; and have the fighting characteristics of two peoples springing from the same stock. Therefore, those sources of weakness in alliances, which it is permissible to expect, would disappear in an Anglo-American alliance."

What do you think of the new diplomacy of fair and open settlement of questions—the square deal against the old one of subterfuge?" I next inquired.

I think all countries are leaning more toward the new idea, and growing away from the old," said the Admiral-Prince, "and your President is a marvelous exponent of this method. No one here, perhaps, will ever know just how hard he worked for the Peace Conference, and how much his heart was in it. Why," he continued enthusiastically, "his efforts for peace became a system. The constitutional monarchy, with Majesty at the head, could not act without the Cabinet and Prime Minister. The constitutional republic was even loaded with a greater handicap, and the autocracy was helpless in this matter. So President Roosevelt worked alone and accomplished his end—the Peace of Portsmouth. It was a marvelous deed."

"What, in your view, Admiral, constitutes the highest citizenship?"

"Why, a convincing proof of honest interest in the community in which you reside," he replied quickly.

"Even to naturalization?"

"In all ways," he answered, slowly. "A citizen should be loyal to the welfare of the country which supports him."

"How will the building of large battleships like the *Dreadnought affect the world's peace?" I interrogated.

"Why, such preparation would certainly have its influence, I should say, particularly with some of the unstable governments found in some of the South American Republics, where the ambition and greed of the rulers amount to cupidity. It seems down there to be a question of 'Get out of the chair; I want to sit in it myself.' The visit of big battleships now and then would undoubtedly improve conditions."

"Is England's policy to build battleships of twenty thousand tons an indication that she is preparing to repel any combined European aggression?"

Something swift and alarming, something I had never seen before, flashed from his eye, and he exclaimed in consternation:

"Politics! There, I won't talk politics. A man in my position would be a fool to talk politics."

I had no thought of politics in the question; but I took another tack.

"Do you think that the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance will insure peace in the Far East, for a generation at least?"

He reflected a moment and then said: "I should say so. Yes, inasmuch as it is so powerful a combination that no one is likely to venture to disturb the peace on the face of it."

"Then you do not believe in disarmament?"

"Certainly not; that would be wholly impracticable. Why, preparedness is the greatest preventive of war."

"Would you care to express your opinion upon the effect of granting free speech and free press in Russia?" I asked.

Prince Louis paused a moment, glanced quickly at me and smiled amiably. He leaned back in his chair, drummed the back of it with his fingers and remarked with quiet significance:

"The Emperor of Russia is my brother-in-law."

The guns then boomed the salute of some distinguished visitor, and the Prince led me to the deck with the grace and courtesy that mark the officer and the gentleman wherever you find him. ANNABEL LEE.

A Great Life-Work Ended

SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS, FOUNDER OF THE Y. M. C. A., PASSES AWAY

SCARCELY possible does it seem, that the vast organization of Young Men's Christian Associations, now doing their beneficent work the world over, could have sprung into existence in a single lifetime, yet it is only a few days ago, that the body of Sir George Williams, the founder of the Institution, was laid to rest in an English cathedral. In his adolescence there was no such Association in existence. He learned the need of it by painful experience. In humble trust and faith he made a beginning, and he lived to see it grow to upwards of seven thousand Institutions in thirty-nine different countries, with more than seven hundred thousand members. How thankful he must have been, in his latter years, that he had been privileged to plant that seed! How he must have rejoiced that the humble effort he made in his youth had been copied so extensively, and that in every Christian country, the Institutions that were the offspring of his consecrated soul, were carrying on the work he had at heart. George Williams was the son of a sheep-farmer in Somersetshire, England, and was born in 1821. His father gave him a fair education, and then apprenticed him to a dry-goods merchant at Bridgewater. On the completion of his term, he went to London, and entered the service of Mr. George Hitchcock, in St. Paul's Churchyard. That period of a young man's life is always critical. From a quiet provincial town to the splendors and temptations of a great city, is a change that tries what the young man is made of. Thousands have been drawn into the maelstrom and have perished. Away from the influence of home, surrounded by companions who have graduated in the school of vice, with no home comforts, and with the doors of the saloon, the gambling house, and the disreputable resort standing open, it is no wonder that the country youth in the metropolis forgets the guide of his youth and forsakes the covenant of his God.

The Room in which the First Y. M. C. A. Meeting was Held

Happily for young Williams, his character was already formed when he began his city career. He had given his heart to God, and had learned the habit of prayer and of associating with godly young men. In his Bridgewater apprenticeship, it had been his custom to invite pious young friends to his bedroom for Bible study and communion with God. He had, consequently, the surest armor on his soul that is given to man and the safest anchor to righteousness. Yet it must have been a trying time. One who was in London at that time, describes the life of the young clerks in the drygoods houses. He says: "They were often behind the counter from seven in the morning until midnight, or later. They lived on the premises, and were herded ten to fifteen in a bedroom at night. There was no sitting-room. They were liable to discharge at a moment's notice. If they failed to effect a sale, if they lost patience with a capricious customer, if in sheer weariness they sat down, they were sent away without delay. If they were ill, they were sent to the nearest hospital, and when they recovered they found their places filled. It was slavery, and hundreds of them went to premature death." Such were the conditions of the dry-goods houses in London when George Williams, then a country boy, twenty years old, made his first appearance in the British metropolis.

A Luncheon in Commemoration of the Sixtieth Anniversary of the Y. M. C. A.

The young man was not ashamed of his religion. He set himself to discover who among his fellow-clerks were Christian men. It was only a little group; but they held together, and did their utmost to win others to Christ. Little prayer-meetings were held in one of the bedrooms, in the short interval between the closing of the store and bed-time and on Sunday afternoons. It was slow uphill work for nearly three years. On a Sunday evening in May, 1844, as Williams and some of his friends were walking home from church service, Williams confided to his friends a plan for a young men's meeting. Hitchcock would let them have the use of a room over the store for the purpose, and it was proposed that a regular fortnightly meeting for prayer and Bible study be held.

At the first meeting twelve young men were present. It was found that four different churches were represented in the little gathering, but that made no difference in the harmony of the meeting. That was the humble beginning of the great Y.M.C.A. movement. When George Williams had risen to be head of the firm, when he had become a wealthy merchant, honored by his fellow-citizens, and had been knighted by his Queen, that little room was to him a sacred place. The store was modernized, altered, and renovated from time to time, but no plans were always barred at the little room on the third floor. That remains to this day in the same condition in which it was sixty-one years ago, when the little group of young men hallowed it by their prayers. It was Sir George Williams' pleasure to receive visitors there, and many an American traveler has been entertained in the historic chamber. They were always welcome, because it was in America that Sir George's plans had been taken up most enthusiastically and with the highest intelligence. To the young men of America, only last April, he sent this characteristic message by the Hon. John Wanamaker, who had paid him a visit: "Watch the advers; keep true; fight on; win the victory; we must win." The old man, then in his eighty-fourth year, was still faithful to his idea, still unwavering in his confidence.

After the initial meeting in the little room, plans were made for reaching the young clerks in other establishments. There were 150 of them in London at that time. Among them were many Christians who appreciated the help of Christian converse. The room became crowded, and it was decided to hire a larger room over an adjacent coffee-house. That, too, soon became too small, and from place to place the movement grew. Sir George never lost interest in it. To the end neither his honors, nor his increasing wealth, nor his extending business, pleased him so much as the multiplying Associations. He was consistent, too, in his business relations. Many a customer has acknowledged his indebtedness to him for friendly help rendered in a crisis. All over the land there were grateful friends who mourned when, early this month, the news came that the good old man had passed away.

THE HACKMAN'S VISIT

THE following story is told by Bishop McCabe:

"I am sometimes startled at the ease with which a soul can be won. And I am often humiliated when I think of the many times and the many opportunities in my life which I have wasted and not used for the winning of souls to Christ.

"I want to illustrate the ease with which a soul can be won. Not very long ago, in a strange city, as the hackman got down off his box and opened the door to let me out, I dropped a quarter in his hand, and as I did so I grasped his hand and said to him: 'Good-night! I hope to meet you in glory.' I had often done that, and thought nothing of it. I went into the house, met my host, and retired to my room for the night. About midnight my host knocked at my chamber door and said:

"'Chaplain, that hackman has come back, and says that he has got to see you to-night. I told him that he had better wait until morning, but he said: "No, sir, I must see him to-night."

"When the hackman came up, a broad-shouldered, rough-looking man, with a great whip in his hand, he stood there in my presence with the tears rolling down his cheeks like rain. He said:

"'If I meet you in glory I have got to turn around. Pray with me.'

"What a privilege it was to pray with that man; what a privilege to point him to Jesus! And yet I never saw him before in all my life. There are 10,000 men in this country that have not had an invitation to come to God in all their lives."

The War of the Churches on the Saloon

By LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D. D.

Rev. J. F. Coors, V. P.

St. Humphrey, Indiana

THE American Anti-Saloon League is now holding its tenth annual Convention in the capital city of Indiana. It was cordially welcomed to Indianapolis by Governor J. Frank Hanly at its opening meeting, Tuesday evening, November 21. The response to the address of welcome was made by Dr. Howard H. Russell, founder of the League, for many years its National Superintendent, and at present State Superintendent of New York. The sessions are presided over by Bishop Luther B. Wilson, of Chattanooga, Tenn., who delivers the annual address on Wednesday evening, November 23.

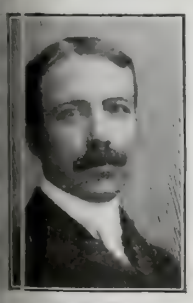
The growth of the Anti-Saloon League has abundant illustration in this Convention. A little over ten years ago, it had its headquarters in the valise of Howard H. Russell, then an unknown Congregational minister; but in a single decade, beginning with its first State organization in Ohio, it has expanded into an effective organization in forty-three States and territories of the Republic. Its superintendents in the Convention at Indianapolis come from all the States bordering on either ocean, as well as the States about the Great Lakes, and along the Mississippi. Its State and district headquarters are now to be found in all the great cities of the nation, and hundreds of men, many of them distinguished as leaders of public thought, are giving their entire time to urge forward this determined war against the saloon.

IC. Dinwiddie, D. D.

The secret of the phenomenal growth of the Anti-Saloon League is to be found in two facts: First, it furnishes the only platform upon which it has been possible to get a Catholic and a Protestant to fight together in harmonious fellowship against the common enemy. On this perfectly non-sectarian platform such noted leaders as Archbishop Ireland of Minnesota, Father J. M. Cleary, and many others, are earnestly co-operating with their Protestant brethren in the war against the drink traffic. Indeed, one of the most hopeful features in the temperance outlook to-day is the increasing number of Catholic priests and laymen who, every year, are seeing with clearer eyes the injury their people sustain through the drink traffic, and who are eager, on this non-sectarian platform of the Anti-Saloon League, to work in harmony with their Protestant fellow-citizens for the overthrow of the worst foe modern civilization has to face.

E. H. Cherrington

The second fact, which explains the marvelous powerof the Anti-Saloon League, is its absolute non-partisanship. It furnishes the first platform upon which it has been possible to get temperance men in all the political parties together, without having a fight among themselves. In every State where the Anti-Saloon League has an organization, there are now thousands of genuine Republicans, Democrats and Prohibitionists who are working in harmonious fellowship against the liquor traffic on the non-partisan platform of the Anti-Saloon League.



ev. W. B. Wheeler

An illustration of the working power of the League in federating Christian conviction, and making it effective in politics, is witnessed in the election the other day in Ohio. Two years ago, Governor Myrno T. Herrick, the present governor, was elected on the Republican ticket by one hundred and thirteen thousand majority. The Anti Saloon League, representing the churches of Ohio, brought before the legislature a Bill for Local Option for cities, and giving the residence section of cities a chance to vote out the saloon. So great was the influence of the League that the bill passed both Houses of the Legislature by large majorities. Then it was that the Governor called the leaders of the two Houses of the Legislature before him, and bluntly told them that unless they amended the bill so as to make it more acceptable to the saloon people he would veto it. Thus the measure, which had been in ideal form, was sadly marred at the dictates of the liquor-sellers. The Christian people of Ohio were outraged by this conduct. Every religious paper in the State condemned the Governor's act. The pulpits, conferences, conventions and synods of all Christian denominations thundered against his conduct. They sought in every honorable way to keep him from being re-nominated, but the political bosses, believing that the saloons were a greater political power than the churches, took the bits between their teeth and forced the renomination. Then, the representatives of the Anti-Saloon League went to the opposition and said: "Give us a Christian, temperance man, of honorable character and standing, as your candidate, and we will make him Governor of Ohio." Hon. John M. Pattison, of Cincinnati, a life-long Christian, temperance man, was nominated, and the battle was on in earnest.

The brewers and distillers sent letters to all the trade, demanding that every man in the liquor business should vote and work for their candidate. On the other side, the Anti-Saloon League, led by National Superintendent P. A. Baker, and State Superintendent Wheeler, marshalled the churches. Prayer meetings were vocal with petitions to God; pulpits thundered and lightened; religious newspapers loyally stood by the cause, and the result, on election day was, that the saloon keepers' candidate went down to defeat, and the friend of temperance was elected by a handsome majority.

The Anti-Saloon League is expecting a great fight at the next Congress. It is understood that a determined and persistent effort will be made to re-establish the government dram-shops at the army posts. The League has been getting ready for the fight. Some months since, it sent Congressman Littlefield, of Maine, and Dr. Edwin C. Dinwiddie, of Washington, to Europe, where they have been examining into the conditions of European armies, and getting ready to defend the private soldiers of the nation from liquor-selling canteens, which a distinguished officer of the Spanish-American war declares was the cause of more deaths than the number of those lost in battle.

The dew of youth is on the American Anti-Saloon League. Its heart is full of courage, and all victories seem possible to the men who are leading it on to battle.

The Women's Campaign Against Polygamy

THE National League of Women's Organizations has sent the following to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for publication:

he National League of Women's O anizations was formed to bring into certed and systematic form the work of he many organizations of women that we striving to contend against the treasonable and polygamous teachings and practices of the Mormon hierarchy. The Nional League invites every woman's organization to join and lend moral support to this work. Already many have united with it, and the result has been a widespread and effective campaign, which has exposed the remarkable conditions which exist in Utah to-day. There are no dues, no obligations, except to give moral support to the movement.

The investigation of Reed Smoot's right to a seat in the United States Senate has proved that polygamy is just as much a part of Mormon doctrine as it ever was.

It has proved that President Joseph F. Smith, who was one of the signers of the manifesto by which the Mormon hierarchy pledged itself to give up plural marriages, and the union of church and State, has broken both of those pledges, and that openly and defiantly he practises polygamy, and dominates the politics of Utah and adjoining States. It has proved that polygamy and political domination have been re-established in more dangerous form than ever before, for with the power of Statehood, the Federal government is powerless to deal with it as it could in Territorial days.

With a boldness never before exhibited, a Mormon apostle was sent to the Senate, and is still there, the trial having dragged along for two years and being still unsettled by the Senate.

The political domination, the commercial domination, the absolute command of the votes of every Mormon, and the unquestioned power to use one million and a-half dollars of tithing annually, makes the Mormon hierarchy a power, which only equally organized and continuous work, with money to conduct it, can hope to subdue. The National League will continue this battle in protection of home and country, in defense of womanhood and childhood, until the nation realizes that the Mormon hierarchy is a dishonored, law-breaking organization, holding in its control, and in slavery of the worst description, thousands of men and women, and undermining the moral tone of all that it touches.

The solution of the difficulty now is to secure an amendment to the Constitution, giving the Federal government power to deal with polygamy in every State.

The people of the nation must help the Gentiles of Utah, Idaho, and other States to take away from the Mormon hierarchy the power to dictate and control politics, and to force them to keep the covenants by which they secured statehood. Money will be needed, and a large sum, to do all that the National League must do to win this battle for righteous, pure living, and obedience to civil and divine law. The National League earnestly asks every organization of women to contribute all it can to this cause. Every woman who reads these lines can do something to help. However small the contribution, let every woman send something. Contributions may be sent to the treasurer of the National League, Mrs. Tennis S. Hamlin, 1316 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.

The Dying Hierarchy

IN the splendid victory won by the Gentiles or non-Mormons, over the Mormons of Salt Lake City, we hail the first-fruits of the great national movement which is destined to sweep away from power forever the polygamous Mormon hierarchy, its satraps, its apostolate, and all its belongings. That the hierarchy should have been defeated in its own stronghold, and especially that the defeat should have been directly attributable to the wholesome detestation, shared by Mormon and Gentile alike, of the influence exerted by Apostle Reed Smoot in the public affairs of Utah, is full of a significance not to be overlooked.

Reed Smoot has been repudiated in the very heart of Mormondom. This Gentile victory is his personal defeat. The Mormon Apostle, who claims the right to make laws for the American people, is a member of the notorious hierarchy, and as such is responsible for all for which that hierarchy stands.

To the people of Utah themselves, the victory sounds the knell of Mormon domination. It means the complete demolition of the Smoot prestige, which has been shattered like a house of cards. It makes his retirement from the Senate inevitable.

In the hearts of all true Americans there is a deep-seated love of freedom, of morality, of justice, of clean government, and an ineradicable abhorrence of humbug in every form. The sending to the Senate of a sworn Apostle of the polygamous Mormon hierarchy was an imposition and a humbug; the pretence that any save a good, loyal, true-and-tried American was fit to make laws for Americans was a humbug of the worst order. It has fooled nobody—not even the people of Salt Lake City. They won't permit the Mormon Apostle to meddle longer with their local affairs. Why should the American people submit to have him legislating for them in the Senate of the United States?

All honor to the true Americans of Utah who have redeemed Salt Lake City! But in their rejoicing, let them not forget that they owe a large part of their magnificent victory to those brave women, East and West, North and South, who have been fighting on the "firing line" against Smoot and the hierarchy for months past, and who have the whole nation now massed behind them in their war for womanhood and the American home.

England's Dead Knight

ONE of the world's distinguished benefactors received honorable sepulture when the remains of Sir George Williams, the founder of Young Men's Christian Associations, were carried to St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on Nov. 14, and there reverently interred. Near his grave are the tombs of the great Duke of Wellington, the conqueror at Waterloo; of Admiral Nelson, and of many of the most famous of England's statesmen. The dead knight was the son of a humble sheep farmer, and he never rose above the rank of a dry-goods merchant, yet all England approves the honor paid to him and all Christendom unites in praising him.

Tennyson has familiarized us with the mission of knighthood, and has told us of the knights who went about rescuing maidens in distress and slaying the oppressors. Not such was the mission of this man, on whom his Queen conferred the honor of knighthood. The oppressors that he attacked were those who corrupt youth and who hold their victims in spiritual bondage. The deliverance he was the means of bringing set free the captives of sin, and introduced them into the glorious liberty of the children of God. It was given to him to initiate a movement that has been of immeasurable service to the Church of Christ. It has been the means of bringing into the Kingdom of our Lord a host of young men, who have added to its strength and have done it distinguished service. In every Christian land there are men who have reason to thank God for putting it into the heart of that godly merchant to begin the good work to which they owe their salvation.

It is right that his last resting-place should be with those with whom his country delighted to honor, for the service that he rendered was one that will gain lustre with every new generation, and will endure when the memory of battles and treaties has passed away. It is on such as he that the benediction of the prophet rests: "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." As he entered into his reward, it would not be the acclaim of slaughtered thousands that would greet him, but the blessings of them that were ready to perish; of men who, through the institution he founded and nurtured, were rescued from temptation, and were led to give the allegiance of their youth to the Prince of Peace.

Prince and Premier

OUR noble visitor, Louis of Battenberg, is an interesting personality. He is by no means to be regarded as a young princeling, traveling either for education or pleasure. He is a man in the prime of life, with a wide experience and a career which has perhaps had more to do with high diplomacy than that of most men who, though near a throne, are not themselves of royal blood. His mission here, though it be simply for an exchange of international courtesies, could not have been entrusted to more capable hands. The interview he accorded a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—the first he had ever granted in America—proves him to be a diplomat familiar with all the great questions that are uppermost at the present moment. This remarkably frank and genial talk from the sailor-prince deserves to be read everywhere.

There is a marked difference, however, between the view of the peace prospect expressed by the Prince and that of Premier Balfour of England, both utterances being practically simultaneous. War, says Prince Louis, is a natural necessity. "You can't make an omelette without breaking eggs," and human lives must continue to be sacrificed whenever any great purpose is to be achieved. "The future will see no wars," said the Premier, speaking at the Lord Mayor's dinner in London. Between these two extremes lies the real solution. As the world advances, violence will gradually disappear before the light of Christian civilization. Step by step, men and nations and cabinets will learn the essential truth that brute force settles no principle. Not until the whole earth has become convinced of this truth, will armies and warships, and all the pomp and panoply of martial days, become things of the past.

The Christian Ministry as a Career

NOT long ago, in his pastoral prayer, a minister asked that there might be in his congregation young men who should choose the Christian ministry as their sphere of service. The petition was unusual. In former days, Christians regarded no profession as so worthy and as affording such large opportunities of usefulness, as the Gospel ministry. Of late, there has been a reaction in the other direction. It is not an uncommon thing for parents to say that they would prefer any other profession for their sons than that of the preacher. Very freely and very insistently the charge is made that the finest young men in our universities, those who are foremost in scholarship and foremost in ability, are looking forward to law, to medicine, to journalism, or to business, rather than to the pulpit, as their future work. There must be a cause for every effect. What is the cause for this extremely common and very marked change of sentiment on a theme most vital.

Possibly, part of the reason is explained by an evident decline in family religion. Family worship has become exceptional as a daily rite in many Christian households. The urgency of trains, the haste of modern life, the greater complexity and the narrower quarters of households, have seemed to combine as influences against instead of for daily reading of the Word of God, and daily prayer of all together in the home.

With the lapse of family religion as crystallized in family worship something very precious has been lost. It is more than probable that in homes where there is no family altar, the devotional exercises of parents and children are often neglected. It cannot be expected that they will consecrate a son to the ministry who have little personal piety to render consecration a delight.

Next, there is very general failure to keep ho Sabbath day, by regular attendance at church, a refraining from secular reading and secular en ments. The Sabbath has ceased to be obligato the consciences of many good people, as a day o and worship. Again, the universal desire to money and to acquire not merely a competence, great fortune, leads young men to turn away fro sacrifices demanded by the Christian ministry, ar vote their energies to more lucrative professions.

Yet, there can be no service so satisfying as th none so noble as that of standing as God's repre tive, to ask erring men to return, to comfort the so ing, and to lead the children into the way of life was the way the Master trod. He said to his disc Follow Me. He is yet saying to all of us, Giv your best. Is He not still saying to fathers and ers, Dedicate the best of your flock to the service Lord's House?

The Case Against Reed Smoo

From the Salt Lake Tribune

THE women of the land who have undertaken th on Smoot have studied carefully the situatio have made this issue: That the Mormon leaders pledges to obtain Statehood; that they have broken pledges; that polygamy is practised by the leaders with their consent by others; that the church is in tics; and that Smoot as an apostle and a member hierarchy is legally and morally responsible.

In large degree, this movement is free from any fare upon the Mormon creed as such, or upon the mon people as such.

They desire to secure the fulfilment of Utah's pl to the nation—such pledges as were given in her b by the Mormon leaders, and by Gentiles in behalf Mormon leaders and people; and immediately they to secure the expulsion of Reed Smoot from the S and to secure a Constitutional amendment which place the control of polygamous relations in the cu of the Federal government.

The war upon Smoot is largely conducted by women, although they have a large co-operation some of the best men in the country, including law officials, ministers, business men and social reformer

Many newspapers and magazines are engaged this side, chief among them being THE CHRISTIAN ALD of New York, which goes into one and a-half lions of homes in the United States every week. conducted the labor of organizing the signatures petition for Reed Smoot's expulsion. It will clos labor within a few weeks, and there will be carri Washington a petition so large that it will have placed upon rollers in order to be moved into the ate chamber—every signature to the petition genu original and representative of the determined senti of the country.

Taken altogether, the women's war upon the Mo hierarchy is led by the people of the finest intellect best education and the most effective influence i country. In addition to these facts, it presents a fectly clarified proposition that the Mormon hierar ruled by a law-breaker, covenant-breaker, and tr and that the other members of the hierarchy are eq guilty with him; and that, having given and still g his first fealty to the hierarchy of which he is a Reed Smoot can take but a traitor's oath before Senate at Washington and has only a traitor's right seat therein.

Anarchy in Russia

CABLE reports from Russia represent a condition of affairs bordering on revolution. The best friends of the Government and the people fear that the Czar's manifesto, granting constitutional g ernment, was delayed too long. The people had lost ience, and had been deceived so many times that they dpised concessions, which, a year ago, they would have fully accepted. It is difficult to form a clear idea of t situation, as the reports are confused, and there ap- rs to be no cohesion of parties. There is evidently a ong suspicion that two classes are working indepen- dtly and from opposite motives, to produce a condition anarchy. The one party is the bureaucracy, the party d ermined on continuing the former conditions, who are i concilably opposed to Witte and constitutional gov- ynment. These are determined to convince the Czar t t concessions are futile, and that Russia can be gov- e d only by the iron hand of a despot. It is suspected t t they are deliberately inciting disorder and provok- i the people to riot. The other party is composed of t extreme revolutionists, who desire anarchy and have n faith in the imperial promises. With them are joined t worst and most desperate characters, who wreak ven- gance on personal enemies and hope for plunder in an e of confusion. Thus Witte is opposed by the highest sses and the lowest, and his only hope is on the fidelity the Emperor, whose weakness a vacillation is notorious.

An ominous feature of the sit- ion is the outbreak of the fleet Cronstadt, which occurred on vember 9. The sailors on the ps had petitioned for a redress grievances, and receiving no isfactory reply, mutinied, led their officers, and, going shore, began to plunder the y. They attacked the armory secured rifles and ammuni- n. Then they marched ough the streets, looting the rit stores, and, crazed with luor, fired indiscriminately on ceable citizens. A strong ce of the Imperial Guard was patched hurriedly to suppress e rising, but they had to use non before the mutineers re subdued.

From fully fifty cities in vari- s parts of Russia reports of ts and disorder were received. Moscow, the rioters gained ssession of a hotel, from the per windows of which they d on the troops. This exas- rated the military, who drew in the middle of the street d fired at the windows, kill- g many inoffensive persons. panic appears to have seized e soldiers, causing them to e at any building in which e occupants appeared at the ndows or on the balconies. At Kiev, Romny, Rostov, d other cities in Southern Russia, there were simi- scenes of violence ruthlessly punished. It was in lessa, however, that the worst outbreak occurred. here the horrors of Kishineff were eclipsed. A wild b went through the city seeking the Jews, whom they rdered with horrible barbarity. Men, women and ildren were brutally slaughtered, Jewish houses pil- ged and set on fire. A conservative estimate places the mber killed at five thousand, but reliable witnesses y that it was not less than twenty thousand. The cry "Kill the Jews!" was heard in every street, and the b, mad with excitement, devastated the Jewish quarters, stroying the houses of wealthy Jews, killing every rson they found, and openly dividing their plunder. either the police nor the soldiers attempted to check e slaughter. Appeals were made to St. Petersburg, and perative orders were sent to the Governor to suppress e riots. Only then did the military interfere, and the b, wearied with slaughter and destruction, sullenly tired.

Mr. W. T. Stead, a consistent friend of Russia, who s just returned from St. Petersburg, where he had a nference with the Czar, takes the gloomiest view of the tuation. He believes that the lowest classes are con- nced that the Government is impotent, and that they ay do as they please. It will, he thinks, cost thousands lives before order is restored, either on a constitutional autocratic basis. The fury of the lower classes, long ent up, is at white heat. The upper classes are now realizing, as did the nobles in the French Revolution, that the hour of judgment for their oppression has come.

As the fire devoureth the stubble, and the flame consumeth the chaff, so their blossom shall go up as dust: because they have cast away the law of the Lord, and despised the word of the Holy One (Isa. 5: 24).

Troops Firing at the Windows of a Hotel in Tverskaja Street, Moscow

Bosses Reproved

The elections this year have been characterized in many States by a revolt against boss rule. The reelection of Mr. Jerome to the office of District Attorney in New York is a typical instance. At the political conventions he was passed over and each party nominated another candidate. This, in spite of the fact that the people, without regard to party, favored him, believing that his conduct in office had been efficient and impartial. But he was not satisfactory to the boss of either party and was therefore turned down. He was then nominated by independent persons, ran on a ticket by himself and has been triumphantly elected. The victory is a direct reproof to the bosses. It was needed. Too long have Conventions given up their power to the bosses who dictate nominations and control the party's action. The dangers of this situation are obvious. It prevents the nomination of really able men, who are too proud to seek a nomination at the hands of the dictator, and it cripples the action of the officer after he is elected. He cannot act on his best judgment, or according to his conscience, but must consider the wishes of the man to whom he is indebted for his nomination, and must take care of his interests and those of his friends. If he fails in this duty the boss decrees that he shall not be renominated, no matter how faithfully or efficiently he has acted during his term. Thus the public loses a valuable servant, whose one fault has been that he has served the people instead of serving the boss. The result has been to raise the boss to the position of a tyrant and to make his candidates mere puppets in his hands. His rule is inimical to the best interests of the people, and if he happens to be a corrupt man, or even merely an ambitious or selfish man, he has opportunities of unbounded gratification of his passions and the acquisition of a large fortune. It is contrary to the spirit of our institutions that any man should exercise this power over others, and it is a good thing that in New York and other States, this year, the voters have thrown off the rule of their bosses.

There is a time wherein one man hath power over another to his hurt (Eccles. 8: 9, R. V.).

Children Disinherited

A remarkable will was recently submitted for probate in the New York courts. It was the will of a wealthy lady, who died a few weeks ago. By it she leaves to each of her two daughters the sum of five dollars, and she gives all the residue in shares, money, and jewels, to two servants, whose behavior she highly commended. The reason she assigned for thus disinheriting her children was thus stated in the will, that "they have shown themselves to be most undutiful, disloyal, and ungrateful children, and I feel that their conduct toward me demonstrates such a lack of filial affection that they are not worthy of any consideration of whatsoever kind from me." It is easy to imagine the disappointment of those daughters when they find that two comparative strangers were preferred to them. If, however, their conduct was really such as their mother describes, they cannot complain that others who acted the children's part were rewarded with the children's portion. It is the principle that Christ laid down in dealing with the Jews of his time, who proved by their conduct that they had no right to the title of sons of God.

If God were your Father, ye would love me (John 8: 42).

Misled by a Mirage

Two men in charge of an oyster boat on the Harlem River, New York, were astonished a few nights ago, by hearing cries for help near their boat. Looking over the side they saw a man clinging to their anchor chain. They called to him to hold on, and they found a rope, which they flung to him. He made it fast to his body and was drawn on board. When restoratives had been administered the man expressed his amazement at the accident. He said he had been walking on First Avenue, and had suddenly fallen into deep water in some unaccountable way. He had not been drinking and was ordinarily sure-footed. The men who had rescued him were able to explain the matter to him. They knew the neighborhood well and had heard of other similar accidents at the same place. It appears that there is there only a string-piece for protection, and any one walking there at night sees the lights from the Bronx reflected in the water and might easily imagine that the avenue ran on, until he suddenly stepped off. There are in our moral lives places of that kind where all seems solid ground ahead, but is a place of spiritual death.

I said I will take heed to my ways that I sin not (Ps. 39: 1).

A Venerable Heroine

There was a dangerous fire on the East Side of New York last week. It was in a five-story tenement, in which almost every room had a separate tenant. The hallways and staircases were thick with smoke before anyone was aware of the fire. Then a quiet old lady, who lived on the first floor, noticed the smoke, and realized that the house was on fire. She opened her window, and called to a boy who was passing, bidding him go to the janitor, and tell him to turn in an alarm. "I am nearly eighty years old," she said in apology, "and cannot run as fast as you." The boy obeyed, and the old lady toiled up the stairways and along every corridor, tapping on each door, and calling out that the house was on fire. The tenants rushed to the fire-escapes or to the stairs, while the old lady quietly proceeded to the top floor. All the inmates but one, who could not understand English, escaped, but the old lady, to whom they owed their lives, could not be found. On the fifth floor she was breathless with the smoke and exertion, and had waited a moment to recover before descending. By that time her escape was cut off by the flames. The firemen saw her white face at a window, and one of them ran up and carried her to the ground. She could not understand why so much fuss was made over her. She said she had only done her duty. Would that Christians, who see all about them people in danger of losing their souls, would show similar concern.

I have set thee as a watchman; therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me (Ezek. 33: 7).

Like a Latter-Day Miracle

A FEW evenings ago, there gathered an audience of men in the old Bowery Mission, to hear the Gospel. There did not seem to be anything unusual about this gathering; the speaker's words were no more earnest than they had been hundreds of times before, yet there was a perceptible difference. A Bowery Mission audience is always attentive; but the faces of some of those present wore a happier, more pleased expression. Scattered through the hall, one could see a man holding a hand to his ear—indeed, quite a number were doing this; but it is a very common movement for one who is hard of hearing.

Observing more closely, however, it was seen that each of these uplifted hands held a little disc—no larger than a watch—from the handle of which depended a flexible, insulated wire. These wires ran along the baseboard at either side of the Mission hall and connected with a box-like arrangement, which was set up in front of the speaker upon the platform, the whole forming a combination which enabled men affected with deafness and who had not been able to hear a sermon in many years, to distinctly catch every word of the discourse. No wonder they looked happy! The preacher spoke in his ordinary tones; yet the men before him lost not a syllable, even when his voice in certain passages sank almost to a whisper.

Hearing Her Daughter's Voice

What is this wonderful invention which enables the deaf to hear? It is called the Acousticon, an instrument which is to the ear what the microscope and telescope are to the eye. The Acousticon is kindred to the telephone; but instead of the transmitter being miles away, and the one who talks unseen, the transmitter is placed upon the platform or pulpit, and the speaker talks at his ease, in ordinary tones, paying no special attention to the little box, which catches and transmits quite clearly his words to the one holding the receiver.

One of the most remarkable tests of this invention occurred at Northfield during the past summer. Mr. W. R. Moody, son and successor of the late Evangelist, Dwight L. Moody, made the announcement that the Acousticon had been installed in the auditorium in order that those with impaired hearing, who were attending the Conference, might once again hear the Gospel. "Since this Conference was established," said Mr. Moody, "many of you have grown gray in the service of the Master. Some of you, I know, do not hear as well as you did; and to you this little Acousticon will bring many blessings."

Rev. George Pentecost, pastor of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church of New York, was asked by Mr. Moody to tell the audience what he knew about the little instrument. He complied, saying in part: "As many of you know, a member of my family, my wife, has been deaf for forty years. During that time I have spent a great deal of money trying to obtain relief. Last summer the Acousticon was called to my notice. It has brought such a wonderful blessing to Mrs. Pentecost, that I suggested to the manufacturers that it would be adapted to the church. Four pieces were installed at first; then, later, more, now there are twenty or more in this church. A VISITOR'S IMPRESSIONS OF THE BOWERY MISSION

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—On this glorious Sabbath day, with sun and air doing so much for those who have bright, comfortable homes, my thoughts turned to the multitudes of sad, homeless ones, and I decided to make the long-promised visit to the Bowery Mission. We arrived in time to see the hundreds of homeless men and boys enter and take their seats in respectful silence, many, doubtless, glad to rest from the weary tramp on the public thoroughfares, having no place to go for rest or refreshment.

It is a most impressive sight to see these men greeted by Mr. Hallimond, the Superintendent. There is a warmth and a cheer in his greeting that must send a thrill through the frames of these discouraged, heart-sick men, and give them an uplift for the week to follow. The earnest prayer from his lips seems to carry all the burdens of these poor unfortunate ones to the very throne of the great Burden-bearer and, with tenderness, lay them at the Master's feet.

It is not strange that this great body of men listen with rapt attention to the words that flow from his lips, as he speaks to them in such clear tones of the reward that comes to those who seek the better life and walk in the paths of virtue. To-day he chose as his theme, Judas Iscariot, or, "The Going Out Into Darkness," and many tears fell from the eyes of the listeners as he showed them what it meant to have the light of the sun shut out from the world, and the condition that would arise because of the chilling of the atmosphere, as well as of the utter darkness. He then showed them that there was a darkness worse than this in the moral world, and into this, step by step, Judas went to his own destruction. He impressed upon them the necessity of coming into the light of God's love at once. Never was a stronger appeal made, and he was rewarded by seeing many hands raised when the question was put, "Who is w ing to come out for Jesus, and who des our prayers?"

To those on the platform, these search words from Mr. Hallimond came w great power. All felt he was giving th thoughts for most serious consideration

The much loved and honored "Mo of the Bowery boys," Mrs. Bird, was be ing upon that body of men with the s tenderness that has won so many from life of sin before they were in comp darkness. The many testimonies f saved ones justify us in thinking that Spirit has come down with great po upon that Mission, because of the faith work done by dear Mrs. Bird and her workers, Mr. and Mrs. Hallimond — latter standing by her husband to hel time of need.

God has blessed, and will continue bless this noble work, which you h always near your heart, and for which labor constantly, and thus make it poss for these faithful workers to "bring in sheaves." LIZZIE MCC. DAVI

"Hitch Your Wagon to a Star"

BY T. B. SUMMERS

HITCH your wagon to a star
And let your best thoughts fly;
Perchance, before they travel far.
Some truth you may descry,
That will of value be to men,
As though they lived their lives again.

Hitch your wagon to a star,
Bid high the courser roam;
Nor let him stop, till far, and far,
You've searched the highest dome
Of heaven for the grandest thought
That can by human ear be caught.

Hitch your wagon to a star,
And I will hitch up mine;
And we will seek new fields, so far
Where naught but good can twine;
And we will woo it; there and then,
To come to earth and dwell with men.

Hitch your wagon to a star,
No grander, truer team,
Can seek so well, the places where
The rarest truths bright gleam,
And all the world will cry, "Well done;
That noble star is earth's best sun."

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

John Hathaway

JOHN HATHAWAY was a good workman, and as honest as the day. His misfortune was that he had a temperament which the Scotch call dour; he could not brook reproof, and he resented the ghtest criticism as if it had been an insult. In con-quence, John was often in difficulties with his friends, d more than once he had lost a good place because employers could not bear with his sullen moods.

For two years John had been Mrs. Mulford's gar-ner, and never had her roses thrived, or her pansies ted in bloom, or her hollyhocks flaunted such splen-r of gorgeous color as under his care The kitchen rden, too, did well, but the flower garden s John's peculiar pride.

During the two years, Margaret Hathaway, hn's wife, had been happier than ever before. t a great grief had come to her in the loss her mother, and so absorded had she been this bereavement, that for a while her soft, straining hand had not been so often on hn's shoulder, nor had she remembered to ution him not to offend Mrs. Mulford, who s a great lady with a fiery temper of her n.

John was never willing to have flowers ked unless they were first going to seed, or less they had to be picked for the good of plant that bore them. Mrs. Mulford, of urse, preferred to gather flowers without her rdener's interference or dictation as to where should go with her garden scissors. There s always a smouldering coal of trouble out this, but John was so faithful and knew much that, on the whole, he was a treasure, d his mistress bore a good deal more from n than she would have endured from a less cient helper.

One day, Miss Agnes Mulford, who was ex-ting friends for the week's end, came rrying into the garden, and stripped it of latest lingering bloom. John was furious d spoke his mind emphatically. Agnes told r mother that his impertinence was not to longer allowed. Mrs. Mulford came forth, lated and annoyed. One word succeeded other and John received his dismissal.

When Margaret knew it she was heart-oken. Here they were, Janet, Baby Jack d she, and her good man, all so happy and mfortable, sheltered, able to save a little ainst old age, and now they were to be rned adrift on the world again. She wept d pleaded, but John was at first obdurate. last, however, he yielded; frowning, obsti-te, but aware that he was doing right in ing to Mrs. Mulford and apologizing.

"I hate to do it, wife," he said, "but I'll it for you and the bairns."

"Do it, dear," she said, "and God will ss you. Please God, John, let us wander more."

Better is he that ruleth his spirit than he at taketh a city. The lesson was not lost John. He tried in humble sincerity to nquer his besetting sin and his efforts were ccessful.

Mrs. Mulford did not want to lose her gardener. She k him back at once, graciously accepting his ex-ses. To Agnes she said:

"Be careful after this, my dear, and don't offend hn, if it can be helped. He is as good as gold, ough so queer and cross. I'd rather buy flowers an part with him: I really would."

"I Hate To Do It, Wife," said John Hathaway

aming the Baby

The baby lies in her cradle, the very sweetest gift God er gave the home. What shall we name her? Poor tle thing, she has no voice in the matter, yet years nce she will rebel, if she have not a pretty name—one at she can be proud of and bear with gentle grace.

There are fashions in names. Old ladies of eighty are Mary Janes, and Eliza Anns, and Sophie Sarahs. Those double names are not now in vogue. Gladys, Ethel, Dorothy, Helen, and Margaret are favorites at present. Twenty Dorothys and fifteen Helens, toddling about on the tiny feet one has at two, in a single small suburb, tell the story of popularity and esteem. Barbara, Penelope, Victoria, Josephine, and other equally dignified names, suit well a winsome little maiden. Elizabeth is stately and beautiful; Euphemia is very lovely, and Priscilla always a happy name for a girl.

In our Southern States they have a pretty custom of giving a daughter as her Christian name a family surname, and, if it be euphonious, it has a certain distinction that is pleasing. As a rule, it is a pity to give a girl or a boy the name of a relative, if that name be harsh, commonplace, or disagreeable. Boys are greater sufferers than girls from this infelicity. There are youths who loathe the name of Jabez, Jedediah, or Ezekiel, though these are good Scripture names and have been worthily borne by good men and true.

A name is inseparably linked with a personality. Therefore, call your son John or David, if you please, Malcolm or Duncan, Theodore or Albert, but do not give him a bizarre, or odd, or unmusical name. Name him for a great man, if you wish, only let it be a great man whose record is closed. Give your daughter a name that is fragrant like a flower, sweet like a song, or dear through long association with household blessedness.

Good Reading for Boys

MOTHERS often ask advice about selecting books for boys. Perhaps the most important thing to do is to awaken in boys a desire for and love of reading. Here and there one finds a boy who is a natural book-worm and ready to pore over everything he finds in print. The ordinary boy, however, very properly has a good deal of business on hand in the shape of active play. He wants to skate, and coast and slide, and make snow forts in winter; to play basket-ball, base-ball and foot-ball, tennis, shinny, and any other game that brings out muscle and endurance in summer. Then he has, or should have, errands to do, work about the house and garden, something that calls out responsibility and initiates him in that care of the home which will by and by make him a good husband. His school work monopolizes a good many hours in school and out, so that his time for actual reading books that he enjoys is rather limited.

Among safe books to put in the hands of your boy, from twelve to fifteen, high place should be given to the Jungle Books of Rudyard Kipling. They teach sympathy with the animal world and inspire a very sincere and true feeling for nature. No boy can resist the charm of their style, and, in a curious and subtle fashion of their own, they teach boys to be manly. Froissart's Chronicles should be in every boy's library. All the books of Kirk Monroe, without an exception, are excellent reading for boys. George Cary Eggleston has written a series of excellent war stories, any one of which will interest a real boy. What are known generally as the Henty books, a long series of historical romances, will lead boys into a love of gallant men and good fighters, who stood manfully for the right. If you really want your boy to be fond of reading, set apart some portion of the long winter evenings that are coming, and read aloud, inviting discussion on the part of the family. More harm has been done by wretched trash, sensational stuff, which sets little fellows off in search of wild adventure and glorifies crime, than by any other agent for evil. In a gloomy prison of New York State there are young men immured for long terms, for burglary and train-wrecking, whose criminal acts were incited by the surreptitious reading of vile papers and absurdly impossible dime novels. When a boy steals away and reads anything in secret, because he fears that it is unfit for his mother's eyes, he is in grave peril. Insist that your boy shall read nothing that he cannot read aloud to father and mother. Spend money for good reading. It will not be wasted. A year's subscription to a library, if there is no free library near, is a good birthday present for any boy. Encourage your boy gradually to fill book-shelves of his own, in his own room. A small hanging shelf is easily made, costs little if bought, and will give a boy pride and pleasure, as, little by little, it becomes filled with good literature. A set of Shakespeare should form part of the boy's literary wealth.

A Suggestion for Funerals

A correspondent sends an interesting description of a floral coffin made in California, and used at the interment of a lady in a place called Sunderland. A straight wooden box of redwood was made by a carpenter, covered inside and out with cheese-cloth. This was then in turn entirely covered with smilax and small twigs from the pepper tree. In this latticed ground-work were fastened white roses, verbenas and rose geraniums. Inside and out the coffin was trimmed and filled with flowers, a profusion of which were heaped over the quiet sleeper. The cost in that land of flowers of the whole, was only five dollars, and it carried out an idea of the deceased who had wished to be thus laid away in her last rest. Only the handles of the coffin were purchased from an undertaker.

WALLS WE SHOULD BUILD

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

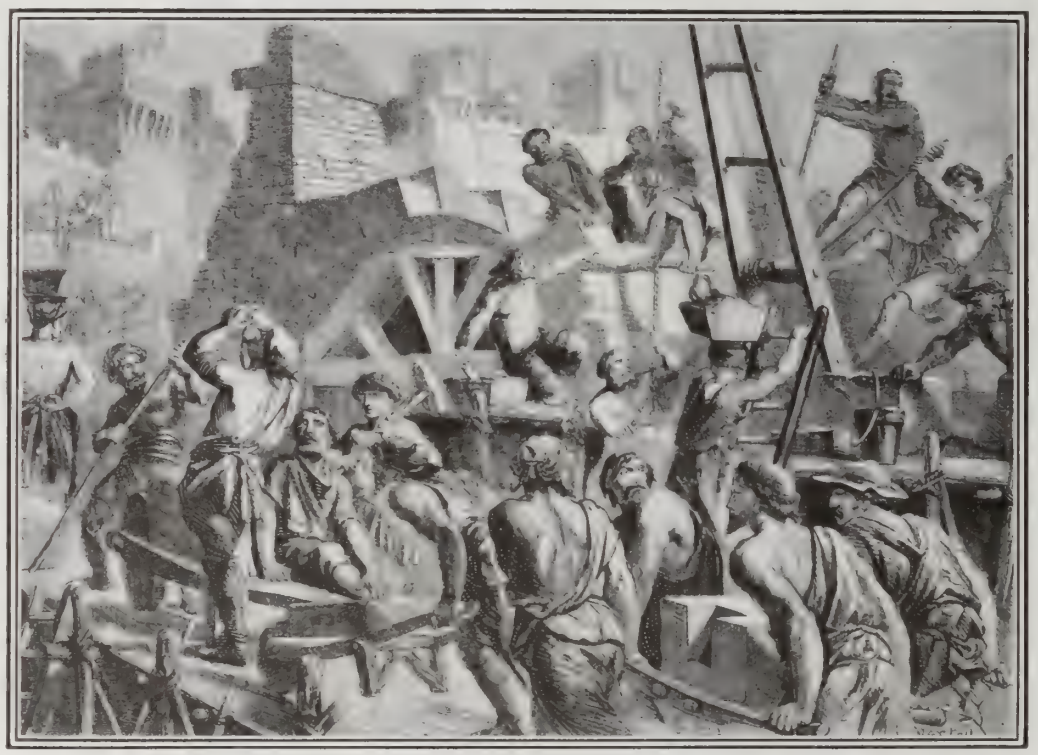
HANANI, the brother of Nehemiah, might have written the following story of the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem. "By appointment of Nehemiah, who has become the ruler of the city of Jerusalem, I find myself in the position of chief gatekeeper, in charge of the city gates, nine in number. From my point of view, there may be something of interest to those who wish to learn how the work was done in the short space of fifty-two days. When I reported to my brother, then in Shushan, the palace of Persia, as the king's cupbearer, that the wall of Jerusalem which had been broken down, and the gates which had been burned, were still in ruins, I had no thought that he would take the matter so to heart. I saw him almost daily for four months after that, and I knew that he was earnestly praying that the way might be opened for him to go to Jerusalem. And when the opportunity came to him through the grace of the king, I was one who accompanied him on his notable journey. I was also one of the small company whom he took with him, three days after his arrival, to view by night the ruins of the walls and gates. The way was so choked up with fallen stone that we had to abandon our horses, and pick our way on foot as best we could.

"The company was small but influential, being made up of 'elders.' They seemed to catch my brother's spirit, and decided then and there that for the safety of the city the walls must be immediately rebuilt. Afterwards, when the whole people were consulted, they said, as one man, 'Let us arise and build.' And Nehemiah proceeded forthwith to divide the people into forty-four working groups, and these he placed in positions so that each man should build the portion of the wall nearest his own home. Thus each man worked as a patriot and a home defender at the same time. The builders had their swords fastened to their sides, while here and there, stationed at different points, were warriors in armor who had accompanied Nehemiah from Shushan. As Nehemiah himself passed around to superintend the building, there went with him a trumpeter, ready to give the signal of danger in case of any attack from foes. Nehemiah had given the people to understand that at such signal they were all to gather closely about him, to be in readiness to act under orders.

"There was need of such precautions, for a triple alliance had been formed by Sanballat, the Horonite, and Tobiah, the Ammorite, and Geshem, the Arabian. At first they tried to stop the building by ridicule, saying that if a fox should put his paw on the wall it would be broken down. But when they saw that did not hinder the builders, they formed a still stronger alliance with the Ashdodites, to come together and fight against Nehemiah. But the builders kept right on, from early morning light until the stars appeared at night. And when they laid down to rest at night, they did not take off their clothes, so that they might be ready upon waking to begin their work again. Nehemiah encouraged the people in God, so that the taunts and threats of the enemies were without avail.

"Then the foe tried another scheme, even intrigue. They sent to Nehemiah to come down to hold a peace parley with them. They sent for him four times, and every time he returned answer: 'I am doing a great work and cannot come down.' Then they sent an open letter, which was an insult and challenge for war, if he did not come to them. He did not yield an inch, but prayed to God to strengthen his hands. A man named Shemaiah, whom we did not altogether trust as a true friend, proposed to Nehemiah that he should go into the Temple, and shut the doors, lest somebody should come in the night and kill him. Nehemiah gave him to understand that he feared no assassin, since his trust was in God.

"The foes from without were bad enough, but when there began to be a dissension among the builders themselves, the situation grew alarming. The work upon the wall was free labor, and those who had been dependent upon wages for daily bread had to borrow money from the rich, for which they gave as security their homes and vineyards and olive yards. It was still further demanded that they should give their children as slaves. When this unkind treatment of the poor by the rich was reported to Nehemiah, he reasoned with the rich people, and brought them to a point where they were willing to give back to the poor the pledges they had taken from them, and even a part of the money, because they had charged too high a price for the food they had sold. Finally, justice and good will obtained among the builders. By their faithful labors, the wall, several miles about, was completed in fifty-two days. A guard of Levites was placed upon the wall by Nehemiah. By this act, it was shown that a religious duty had been performed, for hitherto the Levites had guarded only the Temple. At that time I was appointed gatekeeper, and had my instructions to shut and bar the gates at nightfall, appointing watchers from the inhabitants, every one's beat to be near his own house. And the gates were not to be opened until the sun had risen high. These precautions were necessary to keep out our foes, who were seeking every opportunity to get inside the city."



"So Built We the Wall, For the People Had a Mind to the Work"

Illustration and Application

We have recently had a lesson on temple building and character building, and so this lesson may appropriately be devoted chiefly to building external walls of separation and protection. There are some walls to be pulled down as well as some to be built up. We will speak first of the former.

1. Walls to be Pulled Down. Among the walls that ought to be pulled down are those of enmity that separate nations and denominations. Jesus led the way in breaking down this "middle wall of partition" (Eph. 2: 14) between races and religious bodies that were both made up of sons of God and brothers of Christ, for whom he died. Nehemiah's followers rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem in fifty-two days, but the professed followers of Christ have not completed the breaking down of national and denominational prejudices in nineteen Christian centuries. As Nehemiah's workers built each one over against his own house, let each one of us tear down un-Christian prejudices first of all in his own heart. Surely intelligent white men cannot persist in looking down on all colored races when the Japanese have proved themselves "first in war and first in peace."

Why does the proud white man forget that when his fathers were white savages Christian civilization was brought to them by an Asiatic race? And now the white man must learn war—the very thing he thought he knew best of all—from another Asiatic race. And the white man ought to see that in fighting the worst foe of civilization he has a yet more important warfare to learn from the total abstinence religions of the Orient. Character, not color, is the true test of manhood. "God hath made of one blood all nations of men" (Acts 17: 26); therefore "call no man common or unclean" because of color or race. The spirit that led China to call all other nations "outside barbarians" is a "Chinese wall" that may be found in human hearts in many other lands; but when the Christ really comes in he breaks it down, as in the most beautiful avenues the fences b tween the residences have been remove and the front yards have become one u broken lawn. What is the bearing of a this on our immigration laws? It is n only un-Christian but un-American to e clude by race regardless of character. B we may rightly exclude the vicious a criminal, including Mormons, because "evil communic tions corrupt good manners," and we may rightly exclu the diseased and illiterate, because we can so best ser the whole world by keeping this land of refuge stro and intelligent.

The recent Convention of Evangelical Churches in Ne York City is one of many signs that sectarian walls mu give way, not to "organic union" of churches, of whi the world had enough in Popery, but to unity of spi and federation and co-operation. While it is not desir ble that all churches should be under one management Japan has proved "four armies" better than one—it is constant hindrance to the kingdom of God that his forc in the United States are subdivided into one hundr and fifty-six independent armies, many of them so we that their energies must be used almost wholly for se preservation. The divided churches are building t walls of the new city of God, in town and state a nation and in the mission field, each squad for itse often overlapping, often contending, with only occ sional efforts at unity or even comity. Canada has co solidated nearly all evangelicals in "five armies," a three of these are making hopeful progress toward union that would reduce them to three. Those that ca not federate should at lea co-operate.

2. Walls to Build. Neh miah not only rebuilt Jer salem's fallen wall of ston but also the fallen wall of t Sabbath, the story of whi (Neh. 13: 15-22) may well combined with this lesson, showing how Mayor Neh miah exhibited the same gre executive courage and ener when moral building was volved and inside foes we to be suppressed, as when dealt with the city's mater interests. In a certain ci the people were divided their occupations into s guilds, each residing in a d ferent district: the prof sional men, the mechani the merchants, the huckste the carriers and the amu ment venders, each with separate gate. There ca a giant against the city, a with his battering ram bro down, one after the oth the six gates that protect these six guilds and all th held dear, and let in his h gry horde of followers up them. "Which things are allegory." The wall is t Sabbath, which protects t people in that which is most the dearest treas they possess, their Sabba of rest. The giant th breaks down all the gates that wall is the Sunday paper. He breaks down t gate that protects the Sabbath rest of the prof sional man, by requiring work of the editor; the g that protects the Sabbath rest of mechanics, by requ ing Sunday work of the printer.

In this allegory is the conclusive answer to the shall excuse that "the Monday paper requires most of t Sunday work." There need not be any Sunday wo on a Monday paper, and in some cases there is no There are twenty-four hours outside of the Sabbath which to make it up if no Sunday paper is issued. It as if I gave a tailor a day's work to do for me betwe Saturday morning and Monday morning. If he uses t Sabbath instead of Saturday it is his fault, but if I quire that same amount of work daily seven days in t week it is partly mine. As a matter of fact, the editor staff and the printer do usually perform more or less Sunday work on the Monday paper, but this work making up a paper, done by a few persons, is as nothi to the work of the hundred times as many who distribu a metropolitan paper after it is made up—the ne dealers, the newsboys, post-office employees, expressm and railroad men, who handle the paper all day lo These have no Sunday work to do on "the Monday per." The number of persons who do Sunday work distributing a Sunday paper is, in some cases, a thousa times as great as the number that work in making up Monday edition. The Sunday paper, then, from t standpoint of the civil Sabbath, is chiefly objectiona in that it involves almost every form of Sunday work manufacture, trade and transportation. It is a foe rest, because it keeps the same themes before the mind other days, with the cry of "want" multiplied.

A Progressive Railroad Y. M. C. A.

Neason Jones, Gen Sec'y

IN 1872, when the first Railroad Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association was established in Cleveland, O., it was thought that the next most promising field for the establishment of a branch would be Jersey City, N. J. With this in mind, Mr. Sheaf, who came from Cleveland with the view of interesting the officials of the railroads centering in New York, ranged for and addressed a meeting in the Pennsylvania railroad station at Jersey City at which a number of railroad officials were present, including Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, whose sympathy and co-operation were enlisted and who remained a warm friend of the work until his death.

That was thirty-three years ago, since which time numerous attempts have been made to introduce the work. Three years ago, Mr. Adolph Schlegel, a locomotive engineer on the New York Division, while attending the conference of the Railroad Y. M. C. A. at Topeka, Kan., became so enthusiastic for the establishment of an Association at Jersey City, that he secured over one thousand names of his fellow employees to a petition to the company asking for an Association, and pledging themselves to become members. In presenting the petition to President Cassatt, some one intimated that these were "the grandchildren of the original petitioners." This led Mr. Cassatt at once to decide that they should have an Association at Jersey City, and, as a result, steps were taken to fit up a building at No. 200 Baldwin Avenue, which was made the temporary home of the Association. The men were assured that if sufficient interest were shown in the movement a handsome building would be erected as a permanent home for the Association. It is estimated that this new building, toward which the members are now looking forward with eager interest, will cost in the neighborhood of $30,000.

An Evening Lesson in the Railroad Y. M. C. A., Jersey City

The Attack Upon Mrs. Newman

MRS. NEWMAN, widow of the late Bishop John P. Newman, was lately the object of a singular legal proceeding, which was brought for the purpose of having her declared incompetent to manage her affairs. In September last papers were filed in a county court of New York State, setting forth that Mrs. Newman was incoherent in conversation, forgetful, easily influenced, visionary, a sufferer from senile dementia and "wholly incompetent to manage her person or property." It was further stated that, though no relative had made application for the appointment of a committee to care for her or her estate, an inquiry should be ordered by the court to decide the question of her competency.

By the many friends of Mrs. Newman and of her late husband, this extraordinary attack—which the courts dismissed on the ground of informality—was regarded as absolutely unjustifiable. It was naturally construed as an attempt to get control of Mrs. Newman's property. Lawyer C. H. Crawford, of New York, took charge of her case, and affidavits were quickly forthcoming from a number of prominent persons in the metropolis and elsewhere, testifying to their acquaintance with Mrs. Newman and their conviction that her mental faculties were unimpaired. Among those who so testified were Bishop Thomas B. Neely, of the M. E. Church, who pronounced her "an exceedingly active woman, with definite ideas and keen perceptions and evident ability to carry out her purposes"; Dr. James M. Buckley, Editor of The Christian Advocate, who had known her many years; Dr. Sylvester E. Strong, of Saratoga Springs, N. Y., who had examined Mrs. Newman at the request of an attorney and found her "sound and competent, with accurate judgment, sound and retentive memory," and no trace of senile dementia; and Mrs. Mary E. Merritt, of Nyack, N. Y., who has known her many years and considers her fully capable, mentally and physically, of managing her own affairs. Dr. G. P. Mains; Mr. N. T. Bryan, cashier of the bank of Mechanicsville, N. Y. (where Mrs. Newman has kept accounts for sixteen years); Mr. Lemuel Skidmore, attorney, New York City; Hon. Thomas L. James, ex-Postmaster of New York City, and President of the Lincoln Bank (where Mrs. Newman has kept an account for seven years); Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and several others also testified to their acquaintance with Mrs. Newman, and their conviction of her entire sanity and ability to manage her own affairs. These affidavits were in almost every instance unsolicited.

Mrs. Newman is now seventy years of age and is still very active and energetic in various forms of Christian work. She has been engaged lately in carrying out plans which have been maturing for years, for a work among native girls in Jerusalem. For several years she was the legal Superintendent of the World's W. C. T. U. At one time she was prominent in the movement for the suppression of the liquor traffic in the Congo Free State, and a petition which she formulated, and which bore over 10,000 signatures from W. C. T. U. societies, had a hearing in both houses of Congress. She is a very sweet and amiable old lady, and is greatly beloved by a very large circle of friends.

Have you ever priced hand-knitted or crocheted garments at a store? The difference between the cost of the yarn and the price of the finished garment is pretty wide, isn't it?

Knitted and crocheted garments are in high fashion just now. Why not knit or crochet some for yourself? Put your idle fingers to work, and you will be surprised at how little time it really takes to furnish your wardrobe with the most becoming garments a woman can wear. To produce satisfactory results, however, only the best yarns should be used.

The "Fleisher" Yarns combine all the qualities required by the expert knitter or crocheter—evenness, elasticity, loftiness. They are dyed in a full line of beautiful colors, from the deep rich shades used for afghans, to the light delicate tints for children's garments.

If you use The "Fleisher" Yarns you can be sure that the working will be a pleasure, and that the garment will stand the test of wash and wear.

A THREEFOLD CORD

The Story of a Trio of Twentieth Century Girls

BY AGNES DUNCAN

LAVINA had not forgotten, but her pride forbade her to wear the willow. Her young cousins would have scorned the idea that Cousin Lavina had ever been in love; and as for Tom, after the manner of men, the episode had vanished from recollection, and left no trace.

The family black sheep advanced to greet John Harmon's daughters without the slightest shade of embarrassment. He was a tall, fine-looking man of fifty odd, very well-dressed, and without the least air of poverty. As for coldness—his warmth of affection would have melted an icicle—and if anybody were to be patronized, it was certainly not Tom. Mrs. Tom was a washed-out woman who had once been pretty, but was now commonplace. Her husband greeted her with a gallant adoration that was akin to homage. To him, she was apparently no faded beauty, but, as in a husband's eyes was right, the most bewitching of women still. The three children, two boys and a girl, were delicately fair, like their mother, but bore themselves as if they were sure of a welcome anywhere.

"We are just in from Texas," said Tom, in the heartiest possible way. "I've lost all I ever had, in a mine in New Mexico; am down to hard-pan at last. I had to pawn my watch and Clare's diamonds to finish out the money for our tickets, but it's only a passing annoyance. How fortunate it is that we have struck Edgetown just when Cousin John is away, and you have plenty of room. I said to Clare, if the situations were reversed, we'd take you in, and so here we are."

The manner was that of a sovereign dispensing favors; the personality was suave, majestic, irresistible. Peggy found herself leading the way upstairs, with Clare smiling in the background, and Priscilla flew down to make an omelette and compound batter cakes.

Down came Miss Lavina with the face of a sphinx. But Tom disarmed her at once.

"Upon my word, this is a pleasure!" he declared. "Lavina Pease! And not a day older in twenty years! What is your beauty secret? Why, Clare, she makes us young again, doesn't she? Here are the children, cousin, Marjory, Edmund, Phil, a fine trio, only a little tired and white after a long trip. A few days in Edgetown will set them up. I must find a good private school for Marjory, and see about placing Edmund and Phil in the public school, as soon as we are settled. We have been such wanderers, you know."

"Yes," sighed his wife. "We are never long in one place. I used to like change, but now I'm anxious for a home. When we find the pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, we'll keep open house, and invite you all to come and stay forever!"

They did full justice to Priscilla's breakfast, and as Tom rattled on, gay, debonair, ready with quips and jests, they were all conquered. Even Miss Lavina beamed under his adroit flatteries.

"It cannot be that he is escaping from the sheriff," she whispered to Priscilla in the pantry. "Think of being as poor as a church mouse and having such spirits as that."

As for Norah, she laughed her big, Irish laugh, and went about singing.

"It do be foine," she said, "to see a man so well set up, and smell the breath of a pipe in the house."

"I'm not meaning to encamp here, Peggy, my child," said Tom, later in the day. "But I must ask your hospitality for a little bit of a while till I can turn around. I've an invention that is going to revolutionize rapid transit, eliminate the noise from motors of every variety. There are millions in it, and I've got to find somebody with faith to invest a little at first. I've the brains, Peggy, but I must have a partner with funds, and I'll find him soon, never fear. I always come up like a cork. You can't down a Marshall. Why, Peggy, if your poor father had had any of my enterprise and initiative, he wouldn't be a plodding wretch on a salary to-day, roving over Europe in search of lost health."

The black sheep often surveys the white sheep with this cool disdain. Peggy had to bite her lips to keep back a caustic answer. She wanted to say that her father had always had a roof over his head, and had lived in honor among his fellow citizens during a long life, but Tom was her guest and therefore sacred. Anne would bluntly have told him the truth. Peggy held her peace.

The incursion of a family of five upon a household greatly increases the labor of keeping the house neat, and also very materially augments the expense. At first, from one day to the next, Peggy hoped for the best. Tom, elegant and affable, was the life of the house whenever he was at home.

Every day he sallied forth, to meet a man downtown, uptown, and across the ferry. Repeated rebuffs did not dampen his ardor. A rose-colored vision of success hovered just before him. He openly avowed that he had no money, yet mysteriously he seemed to find enough for his daily wants, and it was costing him nothing for the support of his family. Priscilla sold two pictures and paid the house bills with the money they brought. Peggy drew a little out of the savings bank. Miss Pease fitted the boys with new overcoats and bought a dress for Marjory, making it herself by a modish pattern. Clare did not lift a finger to help. She did not so much as make her own bed. In this world the lame and the lazy are pretty sure to be provided for. But little Marjory possessed energy enough to compensate for her mother.

From some ancestral source this child had inherited honesty, shrewdness and straightforward purpose. She was only fifteen, but with a keenness of vision that often disconcerted her mercurial father she saw through his schemes and discounted them. She it was who flew about and helped every one, dusting, and doing what she could to assist every one from Peggy upstairs to Norah in the kitchen.

"Marjory is a good child," said her mother, plaintively, "but she'll never be a lady. I grieve that my only daughter has such plebeian tastes."

Cousin Lavina looked longingly at Marjory. She saw in her something that stirred a feeling she had not known could move her, the mother-love that may throb with sweet intensity in the bosom of a spinster.

One day, when Clare was more than commonly depressed and was bemoaning her fate in having so ordinary a child as Marjory, Miss Lavina came out with an offer.

"Let me take Marjory home with me for a year or two, Clare," she said. "There is a good school near my home, and I'll relieve you and Tom of all expense. I think mountain breezes would be the child's salvation, for she isn't over-strong."

"I wouldn't want her to be a drudge in a 'way back farm-house," snapped Clare, ungraciously, and the light died out of Marjory's eager eyes.

Miss Lavina's quick temper took fire.

"You were always a simpleton, Clare Marshall," she said. "Better think it over before you refuse."

Tom was more sensible. What he said to his wife in the privacy of their own chamber nobody knew, but she apologized meekly to Lavina, and it was settled that when spring came, or whenever Miss Pease went home, she was to have the loan of Marjory.

Arthur Field and Walter Prescott were of one opinion as regards the prolonged stay of the Marshall tribe, and neither of them had any patience whatever with Tom. Arthur was sure there were shady transactions in the past life of Tom Marshall. Walter, less severe, thought him only unfortunate and probably chronically impecunious. Both young men were furious at the strain the indefinite visit was putting on the Harmons. Arthur spoke to Anne on the subject on one of her evenings of leisure.

"Can't you remonstrate, Anne?" he urged. "Peggy won't, and Priscilla is so soft-hearted she can't."

"You think I'm not soft-hearted, Arthur. I don't know. My father would let them stay. And I'm very, very sorry for them. They belong to the little ones who cannot get on and who must have cups of cold water given them in the desert. If we are all patient, may we not one day claim the blessing, 'Inasmuch as ye have done to one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me?'"

Arthur regarded Anne with an inscrutable expression.

"You Harmons are all too good for this old earth," he said. "One expects to see your wings. Well, it does not become me to frown because Priscilla is an angel and her sisters attendant seraphs."

All things come to an end. One day Tom Marshall rushed home in a perfect gale of delight. His mood was like a whirlwind. He had found a man ready to invest in his invention. Five thousand dollars had been paid him in a lump. He did not offer Peggy anything except thanks, but he carried his wife and the boys off in less than twenty-four hours, and they were gone like a dream. Marjory was left behind.

CHAPTER VI.—PAYING GUESTS

LETTERS from across the sea grew more and more cheerful. Father was enjoying his holiday and throwing off the doubt that he had a right to enjoy it, a doubt that at first had been his haunting distress. Mother wrote as if she were a girl, or a bride on her honeymoon trip. Florence, where they were wintering, wooed them as it only can woo the stranger within its gates. They seemed to have cast away from the home moorings, and to be troubled about nothing.

"The two dear things! I am almost glad father was ill. Otherwise they never would have gone."

Cousin Lavina emphasized the feelings of them all when she said:

"Your father was like a horse in a treadmill, and your mother like a wheel in a rut. Something had to shake them loose or they 'd ha' kept on till they dropped. It takes a good deal to kill a Harmon though, and John 'll come back ready to begin again, fresh as a young man, and worth more, for he'll have things to talk about.

"You girls 'll have to exercise patience, for John 'll talk Europe to you till you'll fly at the very name. We sent our minister abroad one year. He went to Syria and the Holy Land. My! we heard about Syria and the Holy Land till we were nigh dead tired of both, and we sang the Doxology when the Bishop transferred Mr. Darrow to another congregation. Syria 'd be new to them and it had got to be an old story to us. So you'll have to exercise patience."

"We shall do some talking ourselves. We're not writing the story of this winter and sending it over the ocean, you know."

"And a very wise proceeding on your part. What folks don't know don't hurt them."

The plan of taking lodgers had proved an admirable one. Peggy had resisted the pleadings of several people who asked to board, her first experience having alarmed her. Yet she had suffered very little, for Norah and Cousin Lavina had borne the brunt of the work. It might have been worse. Lodgers would, she argued, require only to have their rooms kept in beautiful order; they would get their meals outside. It was through Janet Guthrie that she found the very ones she coveted.

Edgetown boasted a conservatory of music, and students sought it from all over the State. Young women coming to study were obliged to find shelter, and those who were fond of one another did not object to rooming together. Four young women, earnest, eager and seriously bent on improving their time, came to lodge in Peggy's rooms. One brought a piano and another paid extra to practice on the Harmon's Baby Grand, and Peggy found a superfluity of strumming to be one of life's minor trials. But Lena sang well, and Grace played finely, and Gertrude and Marjorie were dear girls who were bent on getting on, and so Peggy took up her neglected church work, visited her poor, reorganized her Sunday School class and found the weekly room rent of her girls a much more useful sum than the board money had been. It accomplished very much more.

This set Peggy to thinking whether she might not utilize some gift of hers, so that her spare time might pay her as if it were a profitable investment.

In visiting the sick and poor of the parish, Peggy often made herself doubly welcome by carrying with her a basket filled with dainty food. It might be a little glass of jelly, or a jar carefully sealed and filled with broth that could be easily heated, or fruit conserves that might tempt the palate of a convalescent.

Peggy was a born nurse and cook. She was arranging a delicate luncheon on a tray to carry to a neighbor who was ill and alone, when Marjorie Dane, one of her lodgers, came into the pantry to borrow some alcohol for her chafing dish.

"Oh, Miss Harmon!" she cried, "how good that looks. I wish you'd put up luncheons for the girls at the conservatory. We go out and forage around where we can, and the restaurants grow so wearisome."

"Priscilla gets orders for miniatures," said Peggy, smiling. "If I had orders for luncheons I might try what I could do. How much do you girls pay for your noonday luncheon?"

"Anywhere from five to twenty-five cents. The girls who pay twenty-five cents every day are our millionaires. Fifteen cents is about the average."

"If I should open a luncheon counter in the conservatory with the principal's permission, would there be patronage enough to give me a profit for my labor?"

"I am sure there would."

"Well, I'll think it over, Marjorie, and I'll talk with my cousin, Miss Pease. Maybe I'll make the trial. Nothing venture, nothing have."

Miss Lavina Pease was a woman of faculty. Do you know what faculty is? It is more than mere facility. It is the ability to grasp a subject as a whole and master its little details, and then do what it requires without a fuss. A person of fuss is seldom a person of faculty. She reminded Peggy that there would be a good deal of management connected with her enterprise, that she would have to furnish the best articles she could for the money she received, and that she would have to buy the best and use it prudently.

"You don't want to run in debt."

Debt was a horror in Peggy's eyes, as it was in her cousin's.

"I won't," she said positively. "If I go into this I need not spend very much at the outset. But if I must spend any more than I have in hand, I'll draw on my birthday fund."

The birthday fund was a sum in the savings bank, that the girls had each laid aside as a nestegg. On birthdays and Christmas, John Harmon had begun when his daughters were very young, laying aside a small sum for them in the bank, occasional windfalls had come from other relatives, or the little mother had saved something, so that each sister had a little fund slowly accumulating to her credit in the bank. The money was held to be sacred. Priscilla had never touched hers, nor Peggy hers, but Anne had twice drawn out something to pay for the lessons she was taking, when she did not want to tax her father's purse. Anne had found this a good investment, and Peggy felt satisfied in following Anne's example, if she needed to do so.

"Have nothing but sandwiches, small cakes, and tea," counselled Cousin Lavina.

"Tea?"

"Yes, tea. A good cup of freshly-made tea never hurts anybody. It's what those girls will most appreciate. But serve it in pretty cups and saucers, Peggy. I'm only sorry I haven't grandmother's gold-banded set here, instead of at home. I'd lend it to

YOU may be so well and strong that the thought of the necessity for Life Insurance hardly ever crosses your mind. But it should occur to you, upon reflection, that life insurance is not obtainable after a man's health is seriously impaired and when his days are clearly numbered. Now when a man can save a little money year by year without feeling it, when he can lay up a substantial fund against the day of his departure,—when this protection for his family is possible and even very easy, what would be your estimate of him if they should be left penniless?

Is your life insured? The holders of over six million policies in The Prudential had reasons for insuring their lives in this company. It would be decidedly worth your while to know why and how The Prudential can satisfy the demand for economy, convenience, security and promptness in veritable Life Insurance.

you, if you'd wash every cup and saucer yourself. Hired hands have never touched that china."

"No hired hands except Norah's would I trust to wash fine china, Cousin, and she will be very busy here. We must leave her out of the question. You are very lovely to think of lending me my great-grandmother's china. I'm glad you can't do it. Put me down for it in your will, Cousin Lavina. I'm not going to risk ancestral china. I'll buy pretty cups and saucers that will answer my purpose."

Miss Pease shook her gray head.

"Now, Peggy," she said, "remember you can place no great dependence on these students. They are full of whims. Sell your nice sandwiches if you choose, but don't go into it so deeply that you can't pull out without trouble."

"Now, Cousin Lavina," answered Peggy, with her eyes kindling, "I've just got another idea. Why didn't I think of it sooner? It's twice as simple. I won't have a lunch counter, and I won't peddle sandwiches, I'll turn my dining-room into a lunchroom, and serve a good hot meal to the students, if they'll promise to try me. I'll figure on it and give the best meal I can furnish for twenty-five cents. Then I'm going about among my friends, to tell them that I know how to make fifty different kinds of sandwiches, and if they'll order from me, sandwiches, and salted almonds, and peanuts, and homemade candies, I'll help out all the Edgewood teas and receptions for the coming year."

"That's sensible."

It proved sensible and feasible. Peggy had some losses and some disappointments, but, on the whole, she did well, and had time for her church work besides. The Harmon house became a busy place, and Norah, for the first time in her life, showed signs of irritability. She had too much to do under the new regime. To let Norah break down would not do, and Peggy found it economical to secure a competent waitress by the day. Everything was going swimmingly, when two things happened to stir the smooth pool and produce a hubbub.

Cousin Lavina Pease suddenly resolved to go home. Peggy would not have believed that she could be so sorry to see her leave. But in the months they had spent together, Miss Pease had shown herself to be like a chestnut burr, prickles outside and sweetness within. Besides this, she had taken hold and given actual help as only a skilled and notable housewife can, and her departure would mean a good deal of added toil for Peggy.

"Winter'll be over soon after the holidays," she said, "and spring ploughing and planting are to come, and my housecleaning must be seen to. Mrs. Sunderberg writes me that we are to have a new minister, and Louise Dezendorf, they're afraid, is going into a decline. So, Peggy Harmon, I'm off. But I'll come and help you out next winter, if John and Mary don't come home, and stop your business careers all around the circle. As soon as I am fairly settled, I'll send for little Marjory to come and spend the summer.

The other amazement was very calmly made by Priscilla, who tranquilly announced that she and Arthur Field had concluded to be married some day soon.

"With father and mother abroad! Oh, Priscilla, how mean to have a wedding without them!"

"Not mean, my dear. Don't call it that. I'm awfully sorry about it myself, but we're not going to have much of a wedding, or any display. I'd like a white gown and some flowers, Marjory for my little bridesmaid, and just a very few dear friends here in this dear home. It is this way you see. Arthur is to be sent by the firm to Australia, to look for the missing heirs to a great fortune; he may have to start any day, and he doesn't want to go alone. I shall never have another such opportunity to see the world, and my last orders are finished and mostly paid for, so that I can get my trousseau in two days, and I'll flit like a bird from a bough. There'll be something over for me to leave with you, I'm sure."

Peggy sat down, and cried, and cried. Priscilla cried, too, but her tears were rainbowed with happiness.

"And I'm to be left alone in this house, Anne at the Guthrie's, you on the ocean, Cousin Lavina deserting me, and father and mother in Florence." Peggy ejaculated this between her sobs. Then she dried her eyes, scolded herself for being selfish, and went off to mix up a fruit cake for the bride.

"It won't be fit to eat," said Norah, grumbling. "Why didn't Miss Priscilla tell us sooner, so that we'd have had a decent cake laid away in the dark and improving with age?"

"Never mind, Norah, dear; she has a soul far above cake," declared Peggy. "Maybe Anne will come home now. That will be a silver lining to the cloud."

This was exactly what Anne did, in part, at least. She came home to spend the nights and Sundays, though the evening return was a little late, for she gave an hour's serious attention to the younger children and their lessons for the next day.

Mrs. Guthrie was reluctant to consent to the new arrangement, but Anne had all along been homesick, and was not sorry to get back to her own bailiwick. She had discovered that a social secretary's place is no sinecure. There was never any lack of occupation. Janet, who admired Anne very much, had given her a good many pleasant outings, and Anne's face and manner showed the influence and benefit of a life of luxury. In contrast with her, Peggy looked worn and thin, and even Priscilla was pale. Anne had been the plainest of the three girls, but she was at the moment the prettiest.

On one point Peggy had been firm. Priscilla was not to marry unless she informed her father of her intention, and received his approval.

"A matter so important as a daughter's marriage, could not take place without consulting the daughter's parents," said Peggy, and she carried the day.

But Mr. and Mrs. Harmon offered no objections. They did not seem surprised, and, if Arthur had business on the other side of the globe, they thought it very proper that he should take his wife with him.

"The year is flying," wrote Mrs. Harmon, "and we have done very little traveling, but we are going to begin soon. Take good care of the house and yourselves and don't be anxious about us. Look out for the silver, and keep doors and windows locked at night."

Then, in a long, tender letter to Priscilla, the mother poured out her heart, wishing her a world of good things, and expressing a hope that she and Arthur might have as blessed a union, as Priscilla's own parents had had, in the long years that seemed so brief in the retrospect.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. N. O. B., Kentucky. "I am a believer in prayer. God heard my prayer for my son. I am praying for the conversion of my children. I firmly believe my prayers will be answered."

Mrs. M. B. W., California. "For long days of terrible anxiety and suspense I took this, with many other promises, to God through Christ, 'And call upon me in the day of trouble. I will deliver, and thou shalt glorify me.' He did deliver, and I acknowledge his faithfulness and loving kindness."

Mary H. H., Connecticut. "Your Answered Prayer column has strengthened my faith, and my heart is full of love and gratitude to my Heavenly Father, who has done so much for me."

Marsden B. K., Massachusetts. "I not only believe but know that God answers prayers. I was relieved instantly from great agony in answer to prayer, but best of all he has forgiven me my sins. My wife has had special prayer answered also."

Mrs. G. B., Ontario. "I have been much encouraged by reading 'Answered Prayers,' and can truly say God hears and answers prayer both in temporal affairs as well as spiritual."

R. E. M., Iowa. "It is very sweet to trust everything to my kind Heavenly Father. He hears me for my children, my husband, friends, everything, but he deals in a way to teach patience and obedience. He knows best what each one needs. Let us trust him and tell him all."

O. S., Washington. "The Answered Prayer column is an inspiration. I am so thankful that others also have proved our Father true to his promise 'to ask and receive.'"

SOUND SLEEP

Can Easily Be Secured.

"Up to 2 years ago," a woman writes, "was in the habit of using both tea and coff regularly.

"I found that my health was beginning fail, strange nervous attacks would con suddenly upon me, making me tremble excessively that I could not do my work whi they lasted; my sleep left me and I passe long nights in restless discomfort. I w filled with a nervous dread as to the future.

"A friend suggested that possibly tea a coffee were to blame, and I decided to gi them up, and in casting about for a hot tab beverage, which I felt was an absolute nece sity, I was led by good fortune to try Postu Food Coffee. For more than a year I ha used it three times a day and expect, so muc good has it done me, to continue its u during the rest of my life.

"Soon after beginning the use of Postu I found, to my surprise, that, instead of tossi on a sleepless bed through the long, drea night, I dropped into a sound, dreamless sle the moment my head touched the pillo Then I suddenly realized that all my nervou ness had left me, and my appetite, which h fallen off before, had all at once been restore so that I ate my food with a keen relish.

"All the nervous dread has gone. I walk mile and a half each way to my work eve day and enjoy it. I find an interest in ever thing that goes on about me that makes li a pleasure. All this I owe to leaving off t and coffee and the use of Postum, for I ha taken no medicine." Name given by Postu Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

ain's Crime and Punishment

After reading and seriously noting the many nions on the problem of Capital Punishment, I l compelled to write a few lines on the manner its treatment. Cain's crime in the murder of el was the first fatal effect of Adam's transssion. It was not to pass unnoticed. The od of Abel cried to God from the earth. A terle punishment was then imposed upon Cain. was driven from the presence of the Shechih, and doomed to be a wanderer and a vaga nd, hated by all men, himself hating all men on the face of the earth. In order that none of his brethren might lift up an avenging hand against him, God placed a mark upon Cain, so that when men beheld him they at once perceived that he was a homicide, kept alive as an example of God's abhorrence of that hideous crime the touching of human blood, the "taking the life of one who is made in the image of God." Cain, in the bitterness of soul said unto the Lord, "My punishment is greater than I can bear."

If hanging and electrocution be abolished, and the assassin be securely placed in solitary confinement without the possibility of escape, would certainly prove to be a terrible punishment. Let such an one be supplied with the purest and best of literature in his own tongue; and although the loving and inspired John says, "For ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him;" who will take upon him to say, that this poor sinner, deserted by man, in all his loneliness, may not repent, and be brought to God through the energy of that Spirit which Jesus is exalted to bestow?

We take it that the clergy of this our day are the wisest, most God-fearing, and most scholarly of any generation. Then it remains for them to show to the rising generation the difference in the sight of God between the murderer who, in a fit of anger, or drunkenness, or other provocation, has lifted his hand and shed human blood, and the professional murderer, who willingly goes forth at the command of his reigning monarch to mow down, maim and destroy human beings of some other country, against whom he himself has not the slightest cause of ill feeling.

Morris Park, L. I. ROBERT DEANE.

At the Eleventh Hour

SATURDAY, September 9th, was a never-to-be forgotten time at the First Pentecostal Mission, 513 Tremont Street, Boston, Mass. Asa Shepard was in charge and gave the message from God's Word, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." It was a powerful appeal to sinners to open their heart's door to Christ. I was impressed that some one was hearing the invitation for the last time. After speaking to several, I was led to a man who was asleep and had seemed to be in a stupor during the service. After shaking him, he opened his eyes and looked up.

"Brother," I said, "Don't you think that it is high time you were making your peace with God?"

"Yes, I do," came the answer, feebly.

"Will you come to the altar and pray?"

"I will." And with my arms around him, we walked to the altar, and knelt in prayer. He made the surrender of his heart to Christ. In a little while we arose. He told us, with tears in his eyes, how that for over twenty-five years he had been a confirmed drunkard; that drink was the cause of breaking up his home, separating his family. It had caused his wife's death of a broken heart. He was an upholsterer by trade, and was so clever at hanging draperies that, twenty years ago, he was sent to Honolulu to decorate the king's palace. I gave him a little Testament and wrote his name on the fly leaf, together with the name of our Mission, and the date. He promised to be present Sunday, but he failed to put in an appearance. Monday morning solved the mystery when the Boston papers announced the fact that the dead body of a man, supposedly Edward Loeffler, was found in an alleyway, hardly a block from our mission, only twelve hours after he left us. The only means of identification was the little Testament we gave him. I went to the City Hospital Morgue and was there able to identity the remains of the man, and I felt as I looked on that lifeless form, that he was saved like the dying thief, at the eleventh hour. Two sons appeared on the scene, and claimed the body of their father, but before it was taken away for burial, we were able to pray over the remains and encourage the two young men with the story of their father's rescue, and they promised to cherish the little Testament, and to follow its teachings to the end of life,

PASSING OF PORRIDGE

Makes Way for the Better Food of a Better Day.

"Porridge is no longer used for breakfast in my home," writes a loyal Britain from Huntsville, Ont. This was an admission of no small significance to one 'brought up' on the time-honored stand-by.

"One month ago," she continues, "I bought a package of Grape-Nuts Food for my husband, who had been an invalid for over a year. He had passed through a severe attack of pneumonia and la grippe combined, and was left in a very bad condition when they passed away.

"I tried everything for his benefit, but nothing seemed to do him any good. Month followed month and he still remained as weak as ever. I was almost discouraged about him when I got the Grape-Nuts, but the result has compensated me for my anxiety.

"In the one month that he has eaten Grape-Nuts he has gained 10 pounds in weight, his strength is rapidly returning to him, and he feels like a new man. Now we all eat Grape-Nuts food, and are the better for it. Our little 5 year old boy, who used to suffer from pains in the stomach after eating the old-fashioned porridge, has no more trouble since he began to use Grape-Nuts, and I have no more doctor's bills to pay for him.

"We use Grape-Nuts with only sweet cream, and find it the most tasty dish in our bill of fare.

"Last Monday I ate 4 teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast, nothing else, then set to work and got my mornings work done by 9 o'clock, and felt less tired, much stronger, than if I had made my breakfast on meat, potatoes, etc., as I used to. I wouldn't be without Grape-Nuts in the house for any money." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. There's a reason.

How Deaf People are Made to Hear

Sound Magnifiers Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Act Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Sound Magnifiers?

They are so soft in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them.

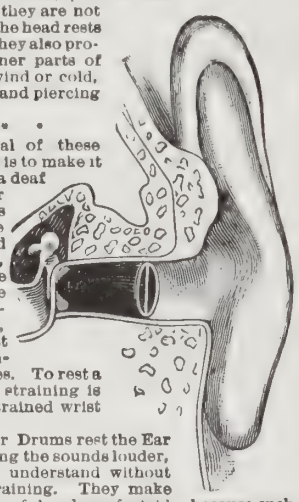
And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums are to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight.

Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just as glasses are sight-magnifiers.

They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain off them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. They can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute, just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off.

And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, because they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.

* * * *



The principal of these little telephones is to make it as practical for a deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing should grow, because they rest up, and strengthen the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.

Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

* * * *

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. It thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.

Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and overcome by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.

Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.

This book has been the means of relieving thousands of Deaf people. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

Write for it today to The Wilson Ear Drum Co., 146 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

Work Under Difficulty

By Mrs. M. Baxter

NO real work of God is undertaken without provoking the hostility of Satan, who always has his agents ready to oppose. He uses mockers. One of these, in the time of Nehemiah, was Sanballat the Horonite, who, when he had heard that the Jews were building the wall of Jerusalem, which, in all probability, he had helped to throw down, he "was wroth,and took great indignation, and mocked the Jews." There are many people who can stand almost anything better than mockery. It cuts keenly at our self-complacency and has the most irritating effect upon our pride. It is only when that self-complacency and pride have ceased to be, by the reality in our experience of having been crucified with Christ upon the cross, and therefore having no claim left to be esteemed of men—that it is easy to accept man's mockery as a permitted fellowship with the sufferings of Him who endured mockery for our sakes.

But why do men especially mock the Jews? Is it not that they were called to be a separate people, and God had promised that the fear of them and the dread of them should be upon the nations that were under the whole heaven, who should hear the report of them and tremble, and be in anguish because of them (Deut. 2: 25)? Asserted strength, which is seen only to be weakness, provokes mockery. Israel had become a prey and derision to the residue of the heathen that were round about (Ezek. 36: 4); and was thus subject to the mockery of the heathen. And Christian people also who have not the power of God with them, are a target for the mockery of those who know not God. "What do these feeble Jews?" asked Sanballat; "will they fortify themselves? Will they sacrifice? Will they make an end in a day? Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of rubbish which are burned?" And Tobiah, with galling irony, said that a fox would break down their stone wall.

How should the man of God meet them? He spoke no word to them, but turned his face to his God, and said, "Hear, O God, for we are despised, and turn their reproach upon their own head . . . for they have provoked thee to anger before the builders." Nehemiah turned the whole matter off from himself on to his God. And thus his own spirit was kept. This is the royal way for a child of God: to pass on to God, and not to deal personally with any affront or insult which is offered to him. And God did not allow this injury to hinder the builders. None of them quitted their work to talk over or to brood over the wrong done to them; the work in hand called for all their energy; they must not be hindered by trifles. "So we built the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof."

This stirred up the enemy. Let us not be afraid of Satan. While we are not to use any railing accusation against him (Jude 9), we are not to fear him; for he is chained, so far that he can only do what God permits him to do. His agents, the enemies of Israel, heard that the repairing of the wall of Jerusalem went forward, and that the breaches began to be stopped, and they were very wroth, and conspired all of them together, to come and to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder it (or cause confusion therein). How should Nehemiah do now? He had no army; it looked serious. Yes, so serious that only God could defend them. And Nehemiah knew it, and therefore he writes: "We made our prayer unto God, and set a watch against them day and night." Watch and pray. Depend on God, and take necessary precautions.

The enemies soon discovered that the Jews were prepared, and they seem to have subsided for a time while the work went on, although, while at work, they had their arms at hand.

Christian Liberty*

WHEN the Gospel set men free from the law it necessarily left the way pen to indulgences which might be harmful to them and to their brethren. It was xpected that they would restrain themelves, and not take advantage of their berty to do things inconsistent with their hristian profession. A child is under reraint at home. He must keep certain ours, he must obey the rules of the housebld. When he leaves home he is free om control, but he makes a ruinous miske if he gives himself up to a life of sinl pleasure. The punishment that might ave been inflicted on him at home for isconduct he escapes, but he brings upon mself retribution that may in the end be arder to bear than the chastisement he ould have suffered in his boyhood.

A wise and affectionate father hopes that hen his son is emancipated from his conol, he will do voluntarily the things that had formerly been compelled to do. e will be a law to himself. That law is ten more effective than the other. The own man, who really loves and honors s mother, will consider her wishes and ntrive for her comfort, when she comes visit him in his home, with a spontaneity at as a boy at home he was not required show. It is a joy and a delight to him honor and gratify her. He is free, yet does more than he used to do under mpulsion. That is the nature of the ristian's liberty. There is no need to ll him that he is not to steal, not to murr, not to bear false witness. He does t want to do those things; they are conary to his nature. There may have been time when it was necessary to lay such mmands upon him, but not now. He is ee, and it is safe for him to be free, beuse he is restrained by the higher law of s being. Thus his freedom works not tord license and indulgence, but toward a ore implicit and spontaneous obedience an he rendered under law.

This law of liberty is our guide in that batable region of amusements and indulnces which perplex so many people. In ery age there are questions of this nare, which Christians have to decide for emselves. There are some things that em right to one man, that seem wrong to nother. If they were explicitly forbidn, the Christian would obey, but they e left open and his conscience must be s guide. In Corinth, in the apostle's ne, it was a question of eating food that d been offered to idols. The Jew shrank m such food in horror; the Gentile uld see no harm in eating it. So the estion was submitted to the apostle and decided it characteristically on a matr of principle. This principle he amplid in his letter to the Romans. Such estions do not trouble us now because ere are no idols and no sacrifices, but the inciple he laid down affects our conduct other matters. We have to apply it to nusements and to our drinking customs. The Christian is not directly and explicitly rbidden to go to the races, to the there, to play cards, or to drink intoxicants, t one is surprised at a Christian doing y of these or similar things. We feel at if he had really imbibed the spirit of rist, he would not do them. It is not r us to judge him, one is his Master, even rist, but we deplore his conduct. We e that such indulgences indicate a low ane of Christian life and set a bad exame to others. The worldling naturally gues that if the Christian has to go to e world for his recreations, his religion nnot be so satisfying to him as he has en led to think. The Christian is bound consider the effect of his example. He ay claim that there is no harm to himself any of the things that he does. Perps he does not get harm from them, ough it is doubtful. But he is bound to nsider the safety of others. That conrn ought to hold him to a higher life. e indulgences he permits himself may to nother man be a curse and a way to ruin. at man may say, "Here is a Christian ing these things. Why may not I?" ot having the Christian's self-control, he lls. In that way harm comes. Thus e altruistic law becomes a restraint that ust be recognized. No Christian has the ght to ask, as Cain did, "Am I my brothr's keeper?" He is bound to consider his brother's welfare, and will not be held guiltless, if, through carelessness, he puts a stumbling block in his brother's way. None of us liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself.

Religious Liberty in South America

AT the Rock River Conference of the M. E. Church, held at Freeport, Ill. recently, resolutions were adopted setting forth that good news has come from South America, where toleration and religious liberty have made substantial progress. In Ecuador, "the Concordat has ceased to exist," and the Congress of that Republic has enacted a law which declares that the State permits the exercise of every religion which is not contrary to its laws, nor to morality, and that "an attack on a religion or the persons of its ministers, shall be punished conformably to the provisions of the police law." In Peru, the government issued an order that the local authorities take prompt and vigorous action to protect Protestant workers and prevent any manifestation against them. The leading papers of Peru are in favor of religious liberty. Word has been received through the Department of State at Washington, that on August 19, a bill passed the Lower House of the Bolivian Congress, which authorizes "the exercise of all religions." The United States Minister to Bolivia writes that the bill will probably be favorably voted upon by the Senate during the present session.

The Conference expressed its appreciation of the work of Rev. John Lee and Rev. Thomas B. Wood, to whose influence and efforts these victories are largely due.

The Conference urged President Roosevelt to exercise his good offices in securing the co-operation of the Governments of England and Germany with our own, "to the end that a united influence be exerted in the interest of religious liberty in every land."

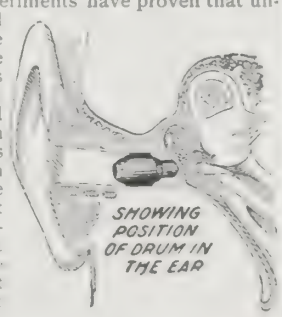
How the Deaf Are Made to Hear
If you suffer from defective hearing write to George P. Way, of Detroit, who for 25 years was so deaf that he was practically cut off from all social intercourse with his fellow men. After exhausting all known devices for the relief of deafness and after years of experimenting in order to relieve his own case, Mr. Way discovered the principle of THE WAY EAR DRUMS.
To-day with a pair of these drums in his ears Mr. Way can hear even low whispers.
The Way Ear Drum is scientifically constructed from a peculiarly sensitized material molded to fit exactly the opening to the inner ear and is entirely invisible.
Note in the illustration its peculiar shape—exhaustive experiments have proven that unless an artificial drum has these exact curves the sound waves are not caught as they should be. Note again how the drum is narrowed down to a small tube just where it strikes the natural ear drum. This feature alone is most valuable as it intensifies the sound waves and makes hearing possible even for those who have almost entirely lost all sense of sound.



Remember that these drums are entirely different from any other artificial aid to hearing, and that the above features are strongly protected by patents and are found in no other drums except the WAY.
Write a frank statement of how you became deaf, how long your hearing has been defective and how much trouble you have with your ears. Mr. Way, who has been deaf himself, will be equally frank with you and will tell you whether or not the Way Ear Drums will help you. Address your letter personally to GEO. P. WAY, 1108 Majestic Building, Detroit, Mich.

Elbert Ansel's Late Thanksgiving

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ELBERT ANSEL stirred uneasily in his chair beside the kitchen stove. He was apparently reading the county paper, which came once a week, and brought the Ansel household its nly news of the outside world; but, in reality, he as listening intently to the conversation of his wife nd daughter. They were making plans which did not lease him. As their low-toned talk went on, a perpenicular frown deepened in his low forehead, making a eep furrow between the eyes. Finally he laid the aper down on his knees, and sat bolt upght, a brown hand on either arm of the lint-bottomed chair. Mrs. Ansel and ulia kept right on, taking no notice of m and his silent perturbation. At last e could stand it no longer, and spoke in sort of rumbling growl, with which Julia d been familiar from her childhood.

"All stuff and nonsense! It will cost oney, and I won't have it."

Mrs. Ansel made no reply. Julia looked ound, smiling.

"What is it, father? Is there anything can do?"

Mr. Ansel's frown grew deeper. He ad been a little under the weather, but as better, and it was only the usual sence of oppressive work in the late utumn that made him content to hug the re. Added to this was a curiosity, peuliar to a meddling disposition, that lways made him eager to know what was n foot in the family.

"I said, Julia, that you and your mother ight as well stop these proceedings you re planning. They'll cost money—hard ash, and I won't have 'em. We can't aste money, Julia."

Mrs. Ansel still said nothing. Her lump, placid face did not change its xpression by so much as a shade. She oved across the room, and quietly took p her mending basket. Putting on her pectacles, she began to darn her husand's thick woolen socks. They were ray socks.

But Julia flared up like a flame blown y a puff of wind. Julia's cheeks were ot. Her eyes glowed.

"Father!"

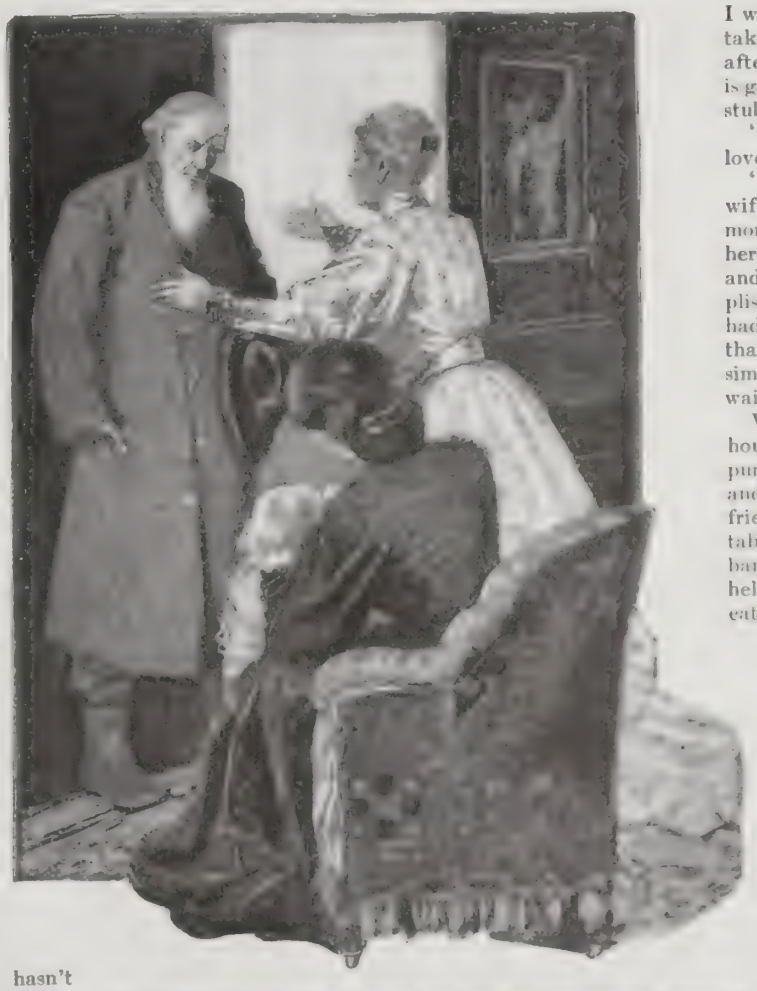
The word was thrown out with force, s if some inward explosiveness sent it forth.

"Well, Julia?"

"Do you mean to say that when mother, who hasn't een away from home for fifteen years in summer's eat or winter's cold, is invited to spend a holiday with unt Bertha in her old home in town, you'd oppose it; ou wouldn't let her go because the trip would cost omething? When has mother, when have any of us, nown the least bit of fun or good times? The boys ere driven from their home by the everlasting misery f saving money that ought to have been spent. I ouldn't stay here one day if it were not for mother. I ell you, father, there are things in this world better han money, more worth seeking after; things like love, nd happiness, and comfort."

She stopped quite out of breath. Her mother, with eyes fixed on her mending, and a hand that never wavered, did not change either attitude or expression. But Elbert Ansel had risen, and faced Julia angrily.

"You are an undutiful daughter," he said. "The place for women folks is in the house, not gadding about the country as if they were wild. You and your mother have all you need. Let me hear no more about this business. You'll not have one penny of my money to go visiting this month, either of you. And further, if you should go, which you won't, you'll both stay till I come after you. Bertha never had the sense of a clucking hen, and she grows worse as she grows older."



"Mary Ansel ran to her old husband and put both arms around his neck"

He reached for his hat from a peg where it hung, put on his old overcoat, green with successive seasons of use, and threadbare, but well wadded and warm, and stamped heavily outside, slamming the door as he went.

Julia, her eyes full of tears, sank into the chair he had left. Presently she broke into sobs like a disappointed child.

"Mother, mother," she exclaimed, "it seems beyond bearing, beyond belief. My father is the richest man in this part of the State and we are poorer than the poorest; so helpless, so tied hand and foot. Never a pleasure, never a change, never even a little glimmer of light. I almost hate father. Sometimes I think I hate God!"

The mother rolled up the pair of socks she had finished mending, glanced from the window out to the barn where old Elbert was pottering about in a lumbering fashion, that showed him still angry and aggrieved, and then, she said a surprising thing.

"Don't take on so, Julia. Hush, dear! You and I will go to Bertha's and have a pleasant visit. We'll take father at his word, and stay until he comes after us. Now, behave as usual, my dear. Nothing is gained by storming at an Ansel, and Elbert is the stubbornest Ansel that ever was born."

"Mother," cried Julia, breathlessly, "did you ever love my father?"

"I love him now," quietly answered Elbert Ansel's wife, and the daughter, wondering, said nothing more. For her own part, she was pretty sure that her love, if it ever had existed, had been winter-killed, and would not revive. How her mother would accomplish her purpose she could not imagine, but she had boundless faith in her mother's word, and from that moment, through the next day or two, she simply did her mother's bidding, watched and waited.

When old Elbert returned from the barn, the house had resumed its air of tranquillity. The cat purred peacefully beside the stove; the table was set, and ham and eggs, sputtering cheerfully, were being fried for supper. Mrs. Ansel took her seat at the table and poured the hot coffee, sweetening her husband's cup abundantly with brown sugar, and Julia helped to the dried apple sauce and the raisin cake, eating her own meal with good appetite.

"You cut the cake too thick, Julia," said her father. "We are not to waste the Lord's bounties."

But he finished his piece notwithstanding, and with something akin to a pleased or placated look on his sharp features, again took up the paper over which he had been interrupted in the afternoon. When the dishes were washed, Julia went into the other room, and sat down to the piano. Presently the sound of music, sweet, full, and silvery, filled the house.

"If the piano were moved in here for the cold weather, Mary, Julia could play without having another fire," Julia's father said, tentatively, for once as if he offered a suggestion, not as if issuing a command.

"You know, Elbert, she pays for the wood herself, out of her earnings, and she bought the piano, too."

"But I paid for her music lessons."

"No, Elbert, you never paid a cent for the children's education, except in taxes. I gave her the lessons. Let her play the piano in peace."

There was a note of firmness in Mrs. Ansel's voice, and her husband heeded it. Rather apologetically, he said: "If you could give Julia a hint, Mary,

BLESSED INVENTIONS

A THANKSGIVING SERMON*

BY REV. FRANK DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D.

A NEW star has arisen in the artistic firmament. Meteor-like, a new star has flashed its light over the western horizon. A new star has come to lead us down to the manger of Bethlehem of Judea. What General Lew Wallace has done with the novelist's pen, the young artist, Byam Shaw is doing with the painter's brush. The Indiana author and the young English artist—the latter born in Madras and educated in European studios—have both been bold, strong, powerful and independent interpreters of religious themes. Lew Wallace's Ben Hur, The Prince of India and The Boyhood of Christ, teach lessons similar to those of Byam Shaw's "The Comforter," "The Outcast" and "Neither Hath He Power in the Day of Death." With the touch of true masters, the inspired novelist and the inspired artist both teach that the true comforter in times of trouble, is that Saviour whom we lovingly call "Jesus the Prince of Peace."

Modern Progress

But though Byam Shaw has painted many pictures, there is one, based upon the book of Ecclesiastes, which has specially impressed me. It is one illustrating the theme of my text. The young artist, in his original way, seems to open for us one of the rooms of the British Museum. In the foreground of his picture he places a Londoner — a British aristocrat — dressed in the height of fashion of the time of Disraeli. Then he seems to surround this man, clothed in kid gloves, silk hat and immaculate linen, with the mighty British library of over 2,000,000 volumes, in which are recorded the scientific and social triumphs of past ages. As you gaze on that picture, in imagination you seem to hear the whistle of factory, the click of trowel, the signal of the railroad engine, and the hoarse voice of the great Cunarder's fog-horn sending her warning call among the mists of Newfoundland, and the ringing of the telephone bell, and we seem to see the flash of the electric spark. Then, under this powerful picture with its up-to-date Bible application, the young English artist has written the words of my text: "So this only have I found that God hath made men upright, but they have sought out many inventions." Never did these Solomonic words burn themselves into my mind and heart more deeply than when I saw them in the brilliant colors of Byam Shaw's strange, and yet powerful and startling picture.

The Widening Opportunity

But when studying that picture, I asked myself this question: "Do all modern inventions truly make men wretched and miserable, as King Solomon implies? Did King Solomon himself mean that all modern inventions were bad? Of course, the greater opportunities of life, which come through the revolving wheels of machinery and the concentration of capital, do naturally offer greater opportunities for wicked men to do evil; but are all great inventions agents of evil?" "No," I answered. "As greater opportunities of life offer greater evils for wicked men, so greater opportunities of machinery and inventions afford greater opportunities of good for good men." Thus, on this Sabbath preceding our national Thanksgiving Day, I will catalogue some of the blessings which, in a good sense, come to good men from the sewing machine, the railroad, the factory, the telephone, the typewriter, the printing-press, and from all the other inventions that have made the past century the most remarkable in a scientific sense, of all the ages.

Most blessed of inventions in the first place, those that deal with health, among which we class the sewerage pipes, by which a great city is kept pure and clean, and the great aqueducts through which it is supplied with life-giving water to drink. What Vipsanius Agrippa tried to do when he built the famous aqueduct of Nimes, which brought the water of the Fountain D'Eure, twenty miles away, to the Baths of Diana; what the Emperor Claudius did when he carried the water from the Alban Hills down to the capital of the Cæsars, which aqueduct still bears his name; what King Solomon did when he built his three famous pools, from which reservoirs he carried the water by subterranean pasages to the city of Jerusalem; what Tarquinius Priscus did, 600 years before Christ, when he built the famous canal, Cloaca Maxima, the oldest and the most famous drainage canal in the world, and which is still used to carry the refuse out of the city of Rome to the Tiber, the great engineers, on an enlarged scale, are doing for our own cities. These engineers may not have the title "M.D." affixed to their names, but they are the greatest of all preventers of disease. Truly, they have done their work well.

But while thanking God for the reservoirs and the aqueducts and the pipe lines which bring to us pure water, and the waste pipes which carry away the disease-breeding refuse, shall we not thank Him also for the marvelous machinery which puts upon our tables the best viands that the harvest fields and the orchards afford? And when I speak of this machinery, I am not only alluding to the wonderful McCormick and Deering reapers, and the ploughs and the seed-scatterers which we saw exhibited at the St. Louis and Portland World's Fairs, but I also allude to the wonderful freight cars, and the huge Atlantic and Pacific steamers, with their refrigerators and cold-storage plants, that bring to us the rarest and the choicest of fruits and vegetables and animal meats and fish and bird meats and mollusks, no matter where they may grow or breathe the breath of life.

Miracles of Machinery

Some people marvel at the mechanism which makes it possible for the farmer to sow and reap fields of wheat hundreds and thousands of acres wide, where their ancestors had only a few acres to a farm. 'Tis true, we must gaze in awe at the wonderful possibilities of the modern farm, through the miracles of modern machinery. Last summer, while riding through the country, I saw a great machine going over the prairie, where once the farmer went swinging his scythe. This marvelous machine was called "A Combined Harvester." It was drawn by thirty-two horses, driven chariot-like, four abreast. That machine cut the wheat, threshed the wheat, gathered the clean kernels into bags, sewed up the bags, threw them to one side, and tossed the straw into heaps. All this happened while the farmer was out taking his pleasure-ride behind his thirty-two horses. Marvelous, marvelous, wonderful, wonderful "Combined Harvester"! But the benefits which come to our table from "A Combined Harvester" are as nothing compared to those that come from the freight car and from the steamer.

Foreign Contributions

Have you ever stopped to consider from how many various sources our food comes? I am nearing the coast of Sidney, Australia. I see alongside the railroad track great numbers of rabbits strung up. There are thousands and tens of thousands of them. I see the hillsides of New South Wales covered with sheep. I go to the wharves, and there I find the great steamers being loaded with them. "What is the good of taking these thousands of sheep and rabbits to London?" I say to the captain. "It will take you at least three or four weeks to sail there. That meat will then be malodorous and stenchful and sickening." "No, no," answers the captain. "That meat is being stored in refrigerators. By running liquid ammonia through the pipes, and letting it evaporate, we can make our own ice on shipboard. That meat will be sold in London markets as fresh as it is to-day." By the wonderful cold storage system of freight car and of steamship, we can to-day eat the choicest fruits of the East and the West and have the tenderest of meats carried through the Sea and Suez C The New Yorker banquet upon Calif fruits, and the in tant of San Francisco, watching the climbing over "Seal Rocks" in the House restaurant, may order by tele his oysters brought by rapid rail from Maryland Bay. Wonderful, derful food provider is machinery!

Machinery may bring to us our Thanksgiving di with "caviare" shipped from Russia, and mol gathered from Atlantic seashore, and fish caugh Florida coast, and bread made from Dakota w fields, and Ohio turkey fattened on Michigan and stuffed with marvelous foreign dressings, potatoes planted in Illinois, and pumpkins fatten New England, and mince-pies concocted in New J and our coffee gathered in Java, and our ba brought from Central America, and our almonds g in Syria, and our oranges shipped from Calif and our olives sent from Italy, and our ter caught in Virginia, and our canvas-back ducks sh Chesapeake Bay, and our cranberries grown near mazoo, and our plum-pudding and fruit cake, lik spices of the Egyptian mummies, gathered from e where, and with their indigestible qualities, reac change us into mummies if we only give them enough chance. While as a cupola upon this m floored or many-coursed Thanksgiving meal, we l the big, thick layer of richly flavored home-mad cream from our own Jersey cow, without whic children consider no Thanksgiving dinner worth name.

All Lands as Purveyors

But I must stop describing the many diff sources from which our Thanksgiving dinner c or else your hunger for material things will out your desire for a spiritual Thanksgiving. S to say, the railroad track and the ocean greyhou well as the wonderful modern reaper and mow the farm, are spreading for us a Thanksgiving ba of which the Romans and the Greeks and the Het or even our own ancestors of one hundred years in the wildest flights of their imagination could conceive or dream. No wonder all the menus o "bills of fare" of all our large city restaurant printed in a foreign language. Foreign lands co ute a great part to all American banquets. God, Japan can furnish Massachusetts her ric well as Louisiana her sugar, and China her tea.

But as I go and study Byam Shaw's picture watch that crowded room of the British Museum, the men and women dressed in the most beautif garments. Of course these garments are not in to-date fashions. They are dressed as people di thirty years ago. When we say thirty years ag instinctively know that the styles are old-fashi for when we realize that every winter, our m and wives and daughters must have their clothes over again completely, or else they feel that they ridiculously out of style, then we know that the ments of a quarter of a century ago must be o style indeed. If our wives wore big sleeves in dresses last winter, then they must wear very sleeves now. If small bonnets were their hea last spring, then this fall their hats must be s like a Mexican sombrero, for thus decrees Pa style. And the average woman would sooner w convict's garb than be out of style.

Indebtedness to the Factory

But though Byam Shaw's characters were dres garments a quarter of a century old, yet, like ou clothes, they were all machine-made garments. linen came from the Belfast Mills. The wools woven not with a Priscilla's spinning-wheel but looms of the Manchester factory. The silks from the silk mills; the kid gloves from the kid factories. The poke-bonnets were made in th factories. The high silk hats, without which no aristocrat feels that he is dressed as a gentlema came from the hat factory. And when we go t our own wardrobes, we hear machinery hummi perpetual sentence: "I made you. I made y made you. I made the cloth of that coat. I made the cloth of that dress. I made that underwear. I made those shoes, and those hats and those gloves. I made you. I made you." And why has machinery made all our clothes? For two reasons: First, because machinery can make our clothes much cheaper than the human hand can make them. Reason the second: Machinery can make those clothes much better and more suitable for comfort and ease.

*Text: Eccles. 7: 29—"They have sought out many inventions."

"Oh," says some cynic, "I do not see any benefit from machinery in regard to clothes. True, the sewing-machine is able to make six dresses for my wife, where her grandmother only had one. But the difference between modern times and ancient times is no difference in the amount of work done. My wife, keeps saying, 'I must have six dresses.' So, every time I come home from business, she meets me with a request for a new hat, or a new coat, or a new dress, or a new pair of evening slippers. And for my part, I would like to go back to the old times, when women and men did not think or talk so much about dress. This talk about dress nearly drives me insane." Would you, my brother, like to go back to the old ways and not have the comforts of the modern machine-made garments? Well, let me see how it fits in your case.

You say you like the old hand-made clothes, hard to make, but clothes which, after they were made, never wore out. How would you like your great-grandmother to knit for you a pair of stockings like those your great-grandfather wore? You say these modern stockings are always getting holes in them. Yes, they are; but there was no danger of your grandfather's stockings having holes in them. Why? They were made as thick as a bed-quilt. Then the beauty of them was that, like a modern Mother-Hubbard dress, they would stretch and be made to fit anyone, or rather they would never truly fit anyone. Then about their lasting. My, how they lasted! They lasted so long that, after awhile, they got as stiff as a board. They lasted so long that they would stretch all out of shape and sink up, and make your grandfather think that his big, clumsy, hand-made boots were filled with briars and nettles. But these stockings were too good, even then, to throw away. And your great-grandfather had to keep on wearing them, and the only place where those bed-quilt stockings finished their period of service, was, when the old gentleman wore them in his basket. For my part, I would prefer my wife to have other duties than making my stockings. I prefer to trust machinery to make them, rather than have her hands make them.

Then you grumble about your wives and daughters always talking about dress. "Oh," you say, "it is dress, dress, dress from morning until night, and from night until morning, whenever the women get together." But who is prouder of his wife when she is dressed well, than you? Are you not a little more willing to go to Thanksgiving service when you are walking by her side, and you think she has a prettier winter hat on than any other woman in the church? Do you not feel mightily humiliated when she does not keep herself neat and up to date? No. I for one do not want to go back to the old poetic times of the spinning-wheel. I do not wish my wife to wear her wedding trousseau, composed of one or two dresses, and a shawl made so strong that they will last for twenty, thirty, forty, fifty years, and then have her will them to her children and grandchildren as family relics. For my part, I thank God for the comforts of modern dress. I thank God that for a mere song, the sewing-machine and the big factory can give me light garments for summer and heavy garments for winter, and brighten my master service, not only with the flowers of the field, but with new spring garments for both masculine and feminine. There is no particular grace in wearing ill-fitting clothes, if by a little turn you can wear a Joseph's coat of many colors. We thank God to-day for a full wardrobe, as well as for a full cupboard,

But after discussing for a little while the benefits which machinery has given to us in our eating and drinking and our sanitation and in our wearing apparel, shall we stop there? Shall we not at least hint at the wonderful benefits that have come to us from telephone and telegraph, and the modern newspapers, and the lights by which we read in the evening hours, and from the typewriter, which has so lifted the onerous burdens of professional and mercantile life, and the electric cars, which, for five cents, make it possible for a business man to be in his office at half-past eight in the morning, and yet take his evening meal in a suburban home surrounded by flowers and grass-grown yard, as well as by wife and children? Shall we not thank God for the wonderful inventions of the biologist's laboratory, for the microscope, the Roentgen rays, and all the wonderful means by which disease is being halted in its onward march and driven back, and by which the crooked limbs are made straight? Shall we not thank God for the wonderful system of street lamps we have, which makes midnight in a large city almost as bright as midday, and which light is the greastest of all crime preventors? And, above all, shall we not thank God for our library shelves filled with books, cheap books, yet books ready to serve us when we stretch out our hands for them; for books which will summon the best men of all the ages to come and tell us how to be good and true and pure and upright and Christian as well as materially great? And the marvelous fact to me about all these inventions I have mentioned is that, without exception, they have all come to their great development during the past century.

We are living in a wonderful age. How wonderful it is not one of us can truly grasp. I was never more impressed with the rapid advancement of material blessings and of inventions, than when reading recently a synopsis of a lecture delivered by the late Bishop Clark of Rhode Island, in 1855. At that time there were no bicycles, no automobiles, no typewriting machines, no telephones, no Atlantic cables, no transcontinental railroad, no great steamship lines as we conceive them, no successful air-ships, no sleeping cars, no large office buildings, with their elevators, and no electric cars. The title of this lecture was, "The Next Fifty Years." These are some of the prophecies Bishop Clark then made: "We have made wonderful progress in traveling facilities during the last half century, but do you think improvement is going to stop there? Nay. Posterity will not be content to travel at the slow rate of only thirty miles an hour, seated in these narrow cars, stifled with bad air and dirt. It costs no great effort to imagine, fifty years hence, a splendid locomotive with hotel, spacious parlors, dining rooms and dormitories, moving gently as the bird flies over a road carpeted by turf and bordered by shade trees and sweet shrubs, from Boston to San Francisco in four days." Have not the good Bishop's prophecies almost literally come true? Shall we not soon leap the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific in less than four days? Then Bishop Clark goes on and prophesies some of the wonderful inventions that have come to pass in the electric world. "The electric battery, which now in some of our cities strike the midnight hour, may be made at evening to light all of our street lamps at one flash, secure perfect uniformity of time in our public clocks, and kindle a beacon on these dreary rocks in the sea, where human beings now endure a melancholy and dangerous solitude." Bishop Clark, from the celestial heights, might see those electric lights shining to-day. Speak out, ye lonely islanders now in touch with mankind. Speak out!

Then the good Bishop goes on and describes the wonderful invention of the modern typewriter, to me one of the greatest labor saving machines in the world. He continues: "There is another invention which I for one would hail with exceeding joy. It may seem absurd to predict that the time may come when it will not be customary to teach our children how to write. It would have been thought just as absurd fifty years ago to have foretold that the boys of this generation would grow up not knowing how to make a pen. But that time is surely going to come. What a tedious, and to some of us painful operation, is the slow process of inscribing with the hand letter by letter, the impressions of the mind upon paper. How difficult it is to make the ink flow as fast as the thoughts. How many rare fancies are lost, vanishing before they are recorded, because the writer must slowly clamber up over the steep ascent of words, syllables and letters. Why need it require man six hours to write thoughts which can be recorded in one?"

As Bishop Clark in 1855, spoke in prophesies of "The Next Fifty Years," so I may be permitted to speak mine. Looking ahead, I see a strange and wonderful world. Before my children shall die, I see the wonderful inventions of the past infinitely developed in producing power. I hear these machines calling to me, "I will make enough bread for all to eat. I will make enough clothes for all to wear. I will build enough houses in which all can sleep. I will print enough books for all to read. I will build enough temples in which all can worship. Then, oh man, if the Christian people of your generation will do their Christian duty, the human race will not only learn the Fatherhood of God, but also the Brotherhood of man. Then, instead of a few having too much, and the many having nothing, there shall be enough bread for all and to spare. May God help us to hear to-day the voice of God in the voice of machinery, bidding us to love the Lord our God with all our mind and strength, and our neighbors as ourselves.

Thus, in closing this sermon on this Thanksgiving Sabbath, I would have us one and all, amid the great hum of factory and by the flash of electric spark, make this one prayer: "Oh God, make me thankful for the food I eat, for the clothing I wear, that of my abundance I may give to Thee and to Thy children." May this be the Thanksgiving prayer of every heart. Then instead of material wealth being the cause of our spiritual overthrow, it will be the means by which we ourselves may be lifted, by lifting a hungry and a naked and a fallen race up toward God and heaven. Then, indeed, shall the desert blossom as the rose and the barren places of the earth, through the power of invention, be filled with the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. Then will our Thanksgiving Day be a glorious Thanksgiving Day for those we love, and for those whom we shall bless.

A Thanksgiving Melody

WAS it not bliss when rosy Spring
Brought flowers, and birds upon the wing,
With rainbows painted in the sky,
And vocal brooks that babbled by?

Thanks warmed our hearts for Summer's green
On woods and hills—and vales between;
For argosies of clouds that skim
The sky, to the horizon's rim.

Soon golden grains brought us delight,
Flushed orchards dazzled sense and sight,—
And, in their Titian-tinted trees
Restored the famed Hesperides!

In all the months, from green to sere,
The panorama of the year,
Far past October's matchless glow
Brought joy in reckless overflow.

What if, to-day, our look perceives
Only dull windrows of dead leaves—
The glory of a Summer gone,
And desolated field and lawn?

They, also, are the tokens fair
Of beauty exquisite and rare,—
Of gathered gifts throughout the year
Certificating Nature's cheer.

When frost shall come, and bleak winds blow,
The spotless coverlet of snow
Itself will clothe the earth with grace,
And crown each yard and dwelling-place.

So, over granary and bin
Well stored, forgetfulness is sin;
Over the cellar amptly filled
Let murmurs and complaints be stilled.

Within unnumbered homes to-day,
Let feasts prevail, let hearts be gay,
And all the nations far and near
Give thanks through each broad hemisphere.

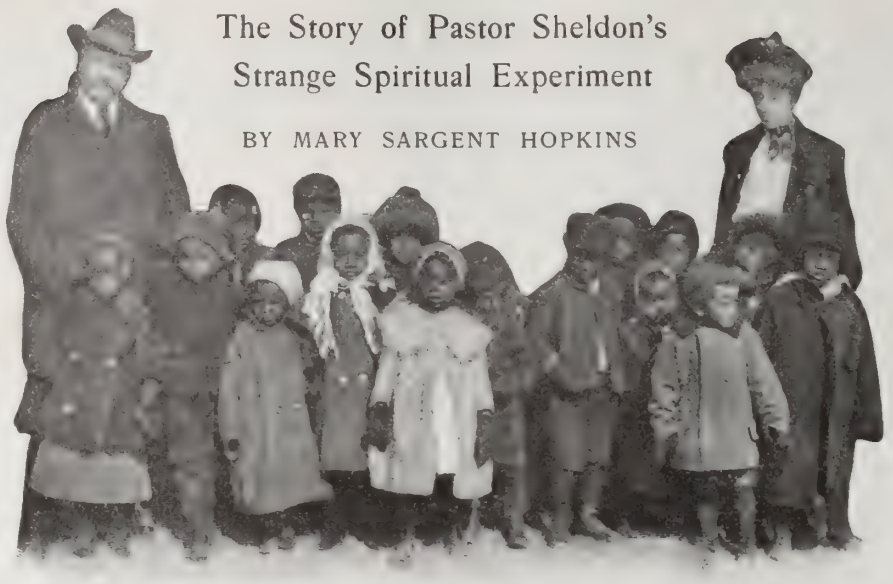
HOW TENNESSEETOWN WAS WON

The Story of Pastor Sheldon's Strange Spiritual Experiment

BY MARY SARGENT HOPKINS



Pastor Sheldon, with Teacher and Group of Kindergartners

WHEN that part of Topeka, Kan., now called Tennesseetown, first became the abiding-place of several hundred negroes, to use the words of one well acquainted with conditions then existing, "it was about as tough a community as one could imagine. The blacks fought and quarreled among themselves, and it was absolutely unsafe for a white person to be seen on the streets after dark."

Most of the inhabitants of the place were old-time slaves from Tennessee, who, at the close of the Civil War, found themselves free, but with no training or education to fit them for anything but the childish dependence, the entire absence of responsibility, which was a feature of slave life in the South. Having not the least idea of law and order, it is not strange that they were amenable to neither in their new home. Poverty, squalor and wretchedness, with their train of even worse evils prevailed. The homes of these people—who had not yet found themselves—were little cabins and huts, of one and two rooms each, surrounded by yards and so-called gardens, which were only equaled in dirt and general disorder by the interior of these miserable homes.
